

CORRIGENDA.

~~~~~

The following errors have been noticed in preparing the Index :

|      |           |         | FOR                                        | READ                                                                                                                                               |
|------|-----------|---------|--------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Page | 11, line  | 24,     | heads,                                     | descendants.                                                                                                                                       |
| "    | "         | note 4, | nam,                                       | man.                                                                                                                                               |
| "    | 15, line  | 43,     | Chonnachtact ,                      | Chonnachtach .                                                                                                                              |
| "    | 33        | " 11,   | Caelain ,                           | Caelan .                                                                                                                                    |
| "    | 35        | " 22,   | of seven,                                  | twice seven.                                                                                                                                       |
| "    | 40        | " 3,    | Mes Seda, Misroeda,                 | Messed, Mesroed, Mes-                                                                                                                       |
|      |           |         | Mesdeda,                            | ded.                                                                                                                                        |
| "    | 50        | " 13,   | Ugainé Mór,                         | Eogan Mór , and whereverthe genitive, Ugainé , oc-curs.                                                                      |
| "    | 51        | " 9,    | Lecain ,                            | Lecan , and wherever thegenitive case, Lecain , oc-curs.                                                                     |
| "    | "         | " 35,   | Bricinn ,                           | Bricin , the nominative,should be substituted forthis or the other form ofthe genitive, Bricind ,wherever it occurs. |
| "    | 67        | " 32,   | Daire Cearba ,                      | Dairé Cearb .                                                                                                                               |
| "    | 81        | " 45,   | Finguine ,                          | Finghin .                                                                                                                                   |
| "    | 83        | " 34,   | Fionntain ,                         | Fimtan .                                                                                                                                    |
| "    | 91        | " 19,   | nine "waves",                              | "nine waves".                                                                                                                                      |
| "    | 92        | " 6,    | fifth,                                     | eleventh.                                                                                                                                          |
| "    | 104       | " 20,   | Gormliath ,                         | Gormlaith .                                                                                                                                 |
| "    | 133       | " 35,   | Suinhairé ,                         | Suinhairé .                                                                                                                                 |
| "    | "         | " 36,   | Suathad ,                           | Snathad .                                                                                                                                   |
| "    | "         | " 40,   | truain cnigh ,                      | tuaircnighe .                                                                                                                               |
| "    | 150       | " 17,   | who were warmed byfire,                | who showed emulation.                                                                                                                              |
| "    | 151, note | 122,    | ca oé ac,                                  | cao eac.                                                                                                                                           |
| "    | 153       | " 125,  | e alcaig,                                  | ealcaig.                                                                                                                                           |
| "    | "         | " "     | ir gaic,                                   | ir gaic.                                                                                                                                           |
| "    | 161, line | 26,     | Fiacha ,                            | Fiachra .                                                                                                                                   |
| "    | 162       | " 41,   | chiefship,                                 | chieftainship.                                                                                                                                     |
| "    | 172       | " 15,   | Enan ,                              | Eman .                                                                                                                                      |
| "    | 187       | " 41,   | Cesarn ,                            | Fathach, Cesarn .                                                                                                                           |
| "    | 207, line | 11,     | southward,                                 | westward.                                                                                                                                          |
| "    | "         | " 21,   | but, said he,                              | no matter, said she.                                                                                                                               |
| "    | "         | " 22,   | I am preparing incan-tations, said he, | I am putting incantationsin that wisp which is inmy shoes.                                                                                 |

|          |      |              | FOR                                            | READ                                                                             |
|----------|------|--------------|------------------------------------------------|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Page 213 | „    | 33,          | Magh Ruith,                             | Mogh Ruith.                                                               |
| „ 218    | „    | 20,          | Albain,                                 | Alba , the nominative, and wherever the genitive, Albain , occurs. |
| „ 236    | „    | 18,          | Sreng his two Sleghs ,           | Sreng one of his two Sleghs .                                      |
| „ 245    | „    | 12,          | Northern Battle of Magh Tuireadh ,      | Battle of Northern Magh Tuireadh .                                        |
| „ 254    | „    | 193, line 3, | noernao,                                       | n-vepnao.                                                                        |
| „ „      | „    | „            | cloromib,                                      | cloromib.                                                                        |
| „ 276    | „    | 214 „ 2,     | h-irgaile,                                     | h-irgaile.                                                                       |
| „ 284,   | line | 12,          | four Colmans ,                          | two Colmans .                                                             |
| „ 295    | „    | 11,          | blade,                                         | blades.                                                                          |
| „ 303    | „    | 24,          | Missive Shields,                               | turned handled missive darts.                                                    |
| „ 304    | „    | 24,          | sent share,                                    | sent a share.                                                                    |
| „ 309    | „    | 2,           | chastises you as a loving woman would her son, | throws you as a lewd woman would throw her son.                                  |
| „ 317    | „    | 7,           | loga should perhaps be                  | foga .                                                                    |
| „ 333,   | note | 37,          | H. 2. 16,                                      | H. 2. 16.                                                                        |
| „ 339,   | line | 36,          | shield,                                        | sword.                                                                           |

„ 340 { „ 7, } The stanza given here is made up of two half quatrains, and is consequently incorrect. The following is the correct text and translation :

|                                         |                                                      |
|-----------------------------------------|------------------------------------------------------|
| lenipa cétna ba clár viretác,           | It was by me an oratory was first built,             |
| ir epor éloéc.                          | And a stone cross.                                   |
| irreo mo éiméat robói im Chrim-than | It was my cloak that was upon Crim-thann |
| 1 cat Ócé.                              | In the battle of Oche .                       |

|                                 |                                                |
|---------------------------------|------------------------------------------------|
| mo lúneé iairn, moceiat uma,    | My Lorica of iron, my shield of bronze, |
| mo énef mo éapac,               | My skin [protection], my friend,               |
| baroccalc péim, fer na n-aircét | He admitted himself the chief of the chiefs,   |
| irreo ponanaéc.                 | Thas it was it that saved him.                 |

Cnes means literally skin, but here and in the Táin Bó Chuailgne, and other places, it is put for skin protection in the sense of a shirt of mail. Hence he describes his "Lorica of iron", as "My skin, my friend". See Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Irish History, p. 488.

|        |      |     | FOR                      | READ                  |
|--------|------|-----|--------------------------|-----------------------|
| „ 364, | line | 34, | fifteen,                 | seventeen.            |
| „ 378  | „    | 6,  | the wisely and arrogant, | arrogant counsellors. |
| „ 381  | „    | 13, | Ceannfeadhua ,    | Ceannfeadhna . |

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS
OF
THE ANCIENT IRISH.
VOL. III.

LECTURE I.

[Delivered 26th May, 1857.]

INTRODUCTION. The subject of the former course. Subject of the present course:—The Social Life, Manners, and Civilization of the people of ancient Erin. Of the existence of a definite system of Civilization in Erin at an early period. The Milesian monarchy; Amergin, son of Milidh (or Milesius), a Judge and a Poet. Of Professors of Music and Poetry among the early Milesians. Of the working of gold mines by Tighearnmas, B. C. 915. Of the introduction at the same time of ornamental drinking cups, and of coloured dresses. Of the law of Eochaidh Edgudhach as to colours in Dress. Silver Shields introduced by Enna Aighnech; Chains of gold, by Muinemon. The first Ogham inscriptions by Cetcuinnigh, A. M. 3941. Of Ollamh Fodhla. Antiquity of the Feis of Tara. Of the three Ferceirtés. Of the name of the province of Connacht. Of the Feis of Tara. Of the institution of a military organization by Ollamh Fodhla. Keting's description of the Feast of Tara. Of the Kingdom of Oirghialla (or Oriel). Of the Dal Araidhe. Description of Cormac MacArt at the Feast of Tara. Keting's authorities. Traditions of the bringing of the law of Moses from Egypt. The Profession of Poet-Judges deprived of their privileges, temp. Concobar MacNessa. Account of the more remarkable of the early Judges of Erin, from the Senchus Mór.

IN my former lectures I entered, as fully and minutely as the nature of an Introductory Course on the Manuscript Materials of our History would allow, into the extent, character, and details of the large and valuable mass of that ancient historic literature, which the wreck of ages, and an accumulation of national disasters almost unparalleled in history for duration and severity, have still left us.

I endeavoured in those Lectures to trace the progress and history of that Literature, in all its varied forms, from the remotest period to which existing authority and reasonable deduction could carry us back, down to our own times. I endeavoured to impress on the minds of my hearers, and I wish I could succeed in impressing it on the minds of all the rising generation of Irishmen, the great educational importance of cultivating the ancient Gaedhelic Language, and of working as they ought to be worked, the mines of philological, ethnological, and historical treasures which that language preserves. And I cannot help expressing the pride I felt in observing that, notwithstanding the great deficiencies of the humble advocate to recommend it, this venerable cause was heard by my audience with an attention so cordial, as to induce the hope that some of them at least, if not many, will soon turn their practical attention to a study now acknowledged by the most distinguished scholars in Europe as one not only of an extraordinary local national interest and importance, but even of paramount necessity in the investigation of the philology, the ethnography, and the history of the family of European Nations at large.

LECT. I.

Subject of the present Course.

The subject of the course of Lectures which it is now my duty to open is different. I hope I have already proved that the materials for a copious history of our ancient nation exist in abundance, although it is true that as yet nothing deserving of the name of a History of Erinn has been written; for it must now at least be admitted that the various compilations published at different times (though often by men of considerable ability), under the name of "Irish History", are not only entirely undeserving of that ambitious title, but are full of mistakes so gross and of omissions so very large as to convey, I will not say merely an inadequate, but an altogether false view of what that History really was. The accounts which all the writers upon the subject have ventured to give of Life and Manners in Ancient Erinn, are, of course, yet more meagre than their statements of historic events, and they are, if possible, still more false—perhaps, because those who have treated of this latter subject, (till the commencement of the publications of the Irish Archæological Society), have been still more ignorant of that which they have pretended to explain to the world. And as the History of a nation can be but little understood without some acquaintance with the Life, the Habits, and Social Ideas—in a word, the peculiar Civilization of the people whose actions are recorded in it,—it appears to me that my next duty, in connection with the Chair I have the honour to fill, is to give some account of the authentic materials we possess towards the illustration of the SOCIAL LIFE, MANNERS, AND CIVILIZATION OF THE PEOPLE OF ANCIENT ERINN. This shall, then, be the subject for our consideration during the present session.

Existence of a definite system of civilization in Erinn at an early period.

It is but reasonable to think that such a people as the Gaedhils of Erinn, whose love of literature and support of literary institutions are now universally acknowledged by historians to have been so remarkable during the darkness of the middle ages, must have commenced at a very early period to construct some kind of social and political system, regulated by fixed and determinate rules, and suited to foster and protect the exercise of their peculiar genius, not only in the walks of literature, but in the various other arts of civilization without the presence of which literature could never have been appre-

ON THE
MANNERS AND CUSTOMS
OF
THE ANCIENT IRISH.

A SERIES OF LECTURES

DELIVERED BY THE LATE

EUGENE O'CURRY, M.R.I.A.,

PROFESSOR OF IRISH HISTORY AND ARCHAEOLOGY IN THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND; CORRESPONDING MEMBER OF THE SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES OF SCOTLAND, ETC.

EDITED, WITH

AN INTRODUCTION, APPENDIXES, ETC.,

BY

W. K. SULLIVAN, PH.D.,

SECRETARY OF THE ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY, AND PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY TO THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND, AND TO THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF SCIENCE.

VOL. III.

LECTURES, VOL. II.

320

AS: SOC: B

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON, AND 20 SOUTH FREDERICK STREET, EDINBURGH.
W. B. KELLY, 8 GRAFTON STREET, DUBLIN.
SCRIBNER, WELFORD, & CO., NEW YORK.

1873.

ciated much less rise to maturity among a people, nor even gain a footing so as to live, had it been imported in full maturity from some other country.

That such a social system and such rules or laws, were in fact in existence, and efficiently sustained, in this country, at a very remote period, and were carried down without material alteration in their peculiar spirit (though with some modifications of course, and subject to many vicissitudes), even to the close of the sixteenth century, I shall, I think, be able to demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt. And without further preface I shall proceed with this design, following the same course I adopted, for clearness' sake, on the former occasion: that, namely, of tracking out the path of our investigation from the authorities themselves, and in their chronological order.

According to the chronology of the Annals of the Four Masters (that founded on the Septuagint), the Milesian colony arrived in Erin in the year of the world 3500—that is, about 1694 years, according to that computation, before the Incarnation of our Lord.

Foundation of the Milesian Sovereignty, B.C.
1694.

According to all our most ancient writings and traditions, the Milesians found before them here, and conquered, the Tuatha Dé Danann colony,—a people remarkable for their knowledge of the domestic if not the higher arts of civilized life, and apparently in a higher state of civilization than their conquerors. So little, however, is certainly known of the Tuatha Dé Danann, that it would be impossible for me, on the present occasion, to treat at large, with any sufficient distinctness, of this interesting people, who so mysteriously disappear as a nation from our history immediately on their subjugation. I shall therefore defer to some future lecture any further reference to what is recorded of their skill in the arts, and shall proceed at once to draw from the more tangible history of the Milesians the main body of my illustrative facts with reference to the Education and Manners of our early ancestors.

We have it on the authority of the "Book of Invasions", contained in the Book of Leinster (a collection be it remembered compiled from more ancient books about the year 1150), that Amergin, one of the Milesian brothers who led the colony into Erin, was a Judge and a Poet; and indeed some small fragments of legal decisions, and of verses, ascribed to him, are found in our oldest manuscripts. A short primary grammar of the Gaedhelic is also attributed to him, of which some traces are preserved in the very old grammatical tract preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, as well as in other ancient books. So that, even with the very coming of

Amergin
(son of Milesius), a Judge and a Poet.

914.15

21 m. s
(V-3)

DUBLIN :
JOHN F. FOWLER, PRINTER,
3 CROW STREET, DAME STREET.

SL. NO
037105

23184

LECT. I.

Professors of Music and Poetry
among the early Milesians.

the Milesians, they must have brought with them some system of positive Law, and some definite literary Education.

There is, also, another record or tradition, belonging to the same remote period, with regard to the original existence and causes of certain marked tastes which characterize the Northern and Southern Inhabitants of Erinn, from which the same conclusion may be drawn. For we find it stated in our very oldest books, that when the two surviving leaders of the first Milesian colony—the brothers Eber and Eremon—had obtained possession of the island, they divided it into two parts between them, the former taking the southern, and the latter the northern half; that they then divided between the two portions of their kingdom the surviving officers, soldiers, and civilians of the expedition; and that after this division there remained two distinguished personages, who belonged to none of those classes; namely, a learned poet named Cir, the son of Cis; and a celebrated Cruitiré, or harper, named Ona. And it is recorded that for these noble followers the two brothers cast lots, by which the poet fell to Eremon, and the harper to Eber; and that it was from this circumstance that the Eremonians, or northerns, continued to be distinguished for their poetry, and the Eberians, or southerns, for their music.

This statement is supported by the following short ancient poem, found in the “Book of Conquests”, which Dr. Keting quotes from the Saltair of Cashel, and of which the following is a literal translation:

- “ The two renowned sons of Milesius,
Who conquered both Erinn and Albain;
With them hither there came
A comely poet and a gifted harper.
- “ Cir, the son of Cis, was the fair-haired poet;
The harper’s name was Ona the fair-haired;
For the sons of the noble renowned Milesius
Was the harper wont to tune his harp.
- “ For the chiefs, who by battles many and fierce Had conquered the sovereignty of Erinn,
Their sweet and well-timed notes they raised,—
For Eber, and for Eremon.
- “ They in a friendly way cast lots
For these professors of the sweet arts,
Until to the southern chieftain fell
The accomplished and most dexterous harper.
- “ Sweetness of string-music, comeliness of race,
Belong to the southern parts of Erinn;
Thus shall it be to the end of time,
With the noble race of valiant Eber.

CONTENTS.

LECTURE XIX. OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC., IN ANCIENT ERINN . . . . . 1—22

(VII.) OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC. (continued). Of the number and succession of the colonists of ancient Erin. Tradition ascribes no buildings to Parthalon or his people; their sepulchral mounds at Tallaght near Dublin. Definitions of the Rath, the Dun, the Lis, the Caiseal, and the Cathair; the latter two were of stone; many modern townland-names derived from these terms; remains of many of these structures still exist. Rath na Rígh or "Rath of the Kings", at Tara; the Teach Mór Mílibh Amus, or "Great House of the Thousands of Soldiers". Several houses were often included within the same Rath, Dun, Lis, or Caiseal. Extent of the demesne lands of Tara. The Rath or Cathair of Aileach; account of its building; the houses within the Rath as well as the latter were of stone; why called Aileach Frigrind? Aileach mentioned by Ptolemy. Account of the Rath of Cruachan in the Táin Bó Fraich. The "House of the Royal Branch". Description of a Dun in Fairy Land. The terms Rath, Dun, and Lis applied to the same kind of enclosure. The Foradh at Tara. Description of the house of Gréde. Two classes of builders,—the Rath-builder, and the Caiseal-builder; list of the professors of both arts from the Book of Leinster. Dubhachtach Mac Fírbíssigh's copy of the same list (note); his observations in answer to those who deny the existence of stone-building in ancient Erin. The story of Bricriu's Feast; plan of his house; his Grianán, or "sun house"; his invitation to Conchobar and the Ultonians; he sows dissensions among the women; the Briathar Ban Uladh;—his house was made of wicker-work.

LECTURE XX. OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC., IN ANCIENT ERINN . . . . . 23—38

(VII.) BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC.; (continued). The description of buildings in our ancient MSS., even when poetical in form, and not strictly accurate as to date, are still valuable for the object of these lectures. Veracity of the evidence respecting the "Great

"To the lot of the northern chieftain fell
The poet with all his varied gifts;
And so, without contest, to the north belongs
The palm of poetry and the chief of poets".

Trifling as these few lines may appear as mere specimens of ancient poetry, still they bring down to us valuable evidence to show, (and I offer it here for no other purpose than to show), that whatever may have been the quality of the poetry and music of the Gadellian race in Erin, they themselves at all events believed, at a very early period, that the cultivation of music and poetry among them was as old even as their own conquest and occupation of the country.

Of what immediate steps the new and successful colony took to preserve and perpetuate such literature and civilization as they may have brought with them into this country, as well as their own history and that of their predecessors, (the Firbolgs, Tuatha Dé Danann, etc.), our ancient records preserve no evidence.

The next entry to be found in our ancient authorities, throwing any light upon the progress of our early civilization, is found in the records of the reign of Tighearnmas Mac Follaigh, one of the earliest Milesian kings of Erin. Tighearnmas, who was of the race of Eremon, became king in the year of the world 3580, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, or 3089 according to the chronology followed by MacGeoghegan: that is about 1620 years before Christ, according to the former, or 915 years before Christ, according to the latter authority. And this king is everywhere recorded as having been the first to discover gold, and to work gold mines, in this country. The precise situation of these original gold mines is not laid down for us; but it is recorded that it was in the forests standing on the east side of the River Liffey that the ore was smelted for Tighearnmas; and that it was smelted by a worker in metals, of the name of Iúchadán, who was a native of that district.

Gold mines worked by Tighearnmas, King of Erin, B.C. 1620 [or 915?]

Iúchadán the first worker in Gold.

We may, therefore, fairly infer that the gold itself was discovered in Leinster; and this opinion is strengthened by our finding the people of Laighin, or Leinster, called afterwards Laighnigh-an-óir, or the Lagenians of the Gold; because (as it is stated) it was in their country that gold was first discovered in Erin.

Gold in Leinster.

Two other short but significant entries respecting the reign of Tighearnmas are recorded, which are similarly useful as marking the advance of the arts of mere luxury at this early period. He is distinctly stated to have been the first that introduced ornamented drinking cups, or horns, into Erin; and it is also

Introduction of ornamented drinking cups, and of colours in dress, by Tighearnmas.

Banqueting Hall" of Tara in the time of Cormac Mac Airt, as given by Dr. Petrie; no record of the changes which took place at Tara subsequent to that time. Residences of the monarchs of Erin after the desertion of Tara. Desertion of other celebrated royal residences:—Emania, Cruachan, etc. Division of the people into classes; this division did not impose perpetuity of caste; increase of wealth enabled a man to pass from one rank to another; crime alone barred this advancement; the qualifications as to furniture and houses of the several classes of Aires or landholders; fines for injury to the house of the Aire Reiré Breithé; of the Aire Desa; of the Aire-Ard; of the Aire Forgaill; of the king of a territory. Law against damage or disfigurement of buildings and furniture; of the house of a Bó-Aire; of the house of an Aire-Desa; of the house of an Aire-Tuise; of the house of an Aire-Ard. Law directing the provision to be made for aged men. Shape of houses in ancient Erin; construction of the round house; reference to the building of such a house in an Irish life of St. Colman Ela; a similar story told of St. Cumin Fada. No instance recorded of an ecclesiastical edifice built of wicker work; two instances of the building of oratories of wood;—story of the oratory of St. Moling; quatrain of Rumand Mac Colmain on the oratory of Rathan Ua Suanagh; account of Rumand writing a poem for the Galls of Dublin; he carries his wealth to Cill Belaigh; statement of seven streets of Galls or foreigners at that place; importance of the account of Rumand.

LECTURE XXI. OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC. IN ANCIENT

ERINN

39—63

(VII.) OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE; (continued). Of the Gobban Saer; mistakes concerning him; explanation of his name; he was a real personage. Old Irish writers fond of assigning a mythological origin to men of great skill or learning. The legend of Tuirbhi, the father of Gobban Saer; observations of Dr. Petrie on this legend; error of Dr. Petrie. Story of Lug Mac Eithlenn, the Sabh Ildenach or "trunk of all arts". Tuirbhi a descendant of Oilioll Oluin. References to Gobban Saer in ancient Gaelic MSS.;—one in the Irish life of St. Abban; the name of the place where Gobban built the church for St. Abban not mentioned; another in the life of St. Moling. The name of Gobban mentioned in a poem in an ancient Gaelic MSS. of the eighth century;—original and translation of this poem (note); original and translation of a poem of St. Moling from the same MS. which is also found in a MS. in Ireland—great importance of this poem (note). Oratories generally built of wood, but sometimes of stone. Ancient law regulating the price to be paid for ecclesiastical buildings;—as to the oratory; as to the Damh-liag or stone church; explanation of the rule as to the latter (note); as to the Cloicteach or belfry. Explanation of the preceding rule quoted from Dr. Petrie; reasons for reëxamining these rules. Dr. Petrie's opinion about the Round Towers unassailable. Law regulating the proportionate stipends of Ollamhs; stipends of the Ollamh-builder;

LECT I.

recorded that he first caused colours and borders to be worn in clothes, as well as ornaments and brooches of gold and silver.

It would appear that, at this time, some system of idolatrous worship was either established, revived, or continued; since we find that this same King Tighearnmas, together with a vast number (three-fourths, say the annalists) of the people of Erin,—men, women, and children,—died in the plain called Magh Slecht (that is, the Plain of Adoration), in the present county of Sligo, while engaged in the worship of the great idol, Crum-Croich; which stood in that plain; the same idol it may be remembered which is said to have continued to receive the homage of the Milesian race, down to the coming of St. Patrick, by whom, only, it was at last destroyed for ever.<sup>(1)</sup>

The death of Tighearnmas and his people happened according to the Annals on the ancient festival of Samhain (our November eve), in the year of the world 3656, and in the seventy-seventh year of his reign.

Tighearnmas was succeeded in the monarchy by Eochaidh, surnamed Edgudhach, (that is, Eochaidh of the Robes),—who was descended of the Ithian race of Munster. He obtained the surname of Edgudhach (i. e. of the Robes) because he first introduced a sumptuary law, as effective as it was simple, by which the people were divided into different classes, distinguished by the colours of their clothes. Eochaidh ordained one colour for the clothes of servants; two for husbandmen; three for soldiers and warriors; four for gentlemen; five for captains, or military leaders; six for the chief poets, or ollamhs; and seven for kings and queens: and it is from this circumstance, says the Book of Leinster, (folio 8), that all those colours have come into the vestments of a Bishop at this day.

Other ancient authorities ascribe the institution of this sumptuary law to Tighearnmas, but I have followed the Book of Leinster.

After a reign of four years, Eochaidh was slain in the year of the world 3667.

Proceeding with the early Annals, we find the following entries in succession.

In the year of the world 3817 died the monarch Enna Aighnech, of the Eremonian race. It was this Enna that first made Silver Shields, (at Airget Ros), and bestowed them on the men of Erin, together with horses and chariots. [Airget Ros (that is, the Silver Wood) was situated in the present <sup>(1)</sup> See as to this Idol, the author's Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History,—p. 103,—and App., pp. 538 and 631.

Death of Tighearn-
mas, in Magh Slecht,
A.M. 3656.

Of Eochaidh
Edgudhach's Law as to Colours in dress.

Silver Shields first made under Enna Aigh-
nech.

Dr. Petrie's observation on the passage regarding the stipend of the Ollamh-builder; dwelling houses omitted from the list of buildings; mistake made by Dr. Petrie about the passage concerning the Ollamh-builder; author's correction of this mistake: meaning of the word Coictighis,—new interpretation by the author. Artistic works of the Ollamh-builder; the Iubroracht or working in yew-wood; carving in yew-wood at Emania and Cruachan, and in Armagh cathedral. Romantic origin of work in yew-wood—legend of Fintann, son of Bochra; no trace of the doctrine of metempsychosis among the Gaedhil; legend of Fintann, continued. List of articles of household furniture mentioned in the laws regarding lending or pledging. Law regarding the house of a doctor.

LECTURE XXII. OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC., IN ANCIENT

ERINN

64—86

(VII.) OF BUILDINGS, FURNITURE, ETC.; (continued). Stone buildings; Cathairs and Clochans; O'Flaherty's notice of the Clochans of the Arann Islands; Clochans still existing in those islands; Clochans on other islands of the western coast. Mr. Du Noyer's account of ancient stone buildings in Kerry; his ethnological comparisons; summary of his views; apart his speculations, his paper is important. Different members of the same family had distinct houses in ancient Erin. Mr. Du Noyer's claim to priority in the discovery of the stone buildings of Kerry inadmissible; Mr. R. Hitchcock had already noticed them; ancient burial grounds also noticed by the latter in the same district. The two names of "Cahers" given by Mr. Du Noyer, not ancient; his opinion of the use of Dunbeg fort not correct; this and the other forts did not form a line of fortifications. Instance of a bee-hive house or Clochan having been built within the Rath of Aileach. Limited use of the term Cathair; the same term not always applied to the same kind of building. Tale of the dispute about the "champion's share"; Smith's notice of Sliabh Mis and Cathair Conroi; story of the dispute about the "champion's share" (continued). The "guard room" or "watching seat". The position of Cathair Conroi not exactly ascertained. Story of "the slaughter of Cathair Conroi". Reference to Cathair Conroi in the tale of "the Battle of Ventry Harbour". Modern hypothesis of the inferiority of the Milesians. Stone-building in ancient Erin not exclusively pre-Milesian. The Aitheach Tuatha or Atticotti. The Firbolgs still powerful in the sixth century. Town-land names derived from Cathairs. No evidence that the Milesians were a ruder race than their predecessors in Erin.

LECTURE XXIII. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS

87—107

(VIII.) Early sumptuary law regulating the colours of dress, attributed to the monarchs Tighernmas and Eochaidh and Edgudach. Native gold first smelted by Iuchadan, and golden ornaments made in Ireland in the reign of Tighernmas. The uses of colours to distinguish the several classes of society, also attributed to the same Eochaidh; the nature of those colours not specified. Household county of Kilkenny. The ancient fort of Rath Betha, (in the present parish of Rath Beth, in the barony of Galmoy, near Ballyragget), in which Eremon died and was buried, stood in it.] LECT. I.

In the year of the world 3872 died the monarch Muinemon, of the race of Eber. It was this Muinemon that first caused Chains of Gold to be worn on the necks of kings and chiefs in Erin. Chains of Gold first made under Muinemon.

About the year 3879 lived Mainmairic, King of Munster, of the line of Eber. He was the first that purchased gold and silver in Erin.

In the year 3882 died the monarch Fail-dearg-doid (that is, the man of the Red-ringed Hands), of the line of Eber. He was the first that caused Rings of Gold to be worn on the fingers of nobles of Erin.

About the year 3941 flourished Cetcuinnigh, King of Munster, of the line of Eber. He was the first that inscribed Ogham memorials in Erin. The first Ogham inscriptions by Cetcuinnigh, A. M. 3941.

Righairled, son to this Cetcuinnigh, succeeded his father, and was the first who had Chariots built in Erin.

In the year of the world 3991 died the monarch Fiacha Finnailghes, of the race of Ir, after a reign of twenty years. He was the first that dug Spring Wells in Erin.

In the year of the world 4176 died the monarch Roitheachtai, of the line of Eber, after a reign of seven years. He was the first that drove a chariot with four horses in Erin.

In the year of the world 4463 died the monarch Lughaidh Laighné, of the line of Eber, after a reign of seven years. He was the first that "invented" Bronze and Bronze Spears in Erin.

There are different versions of this list of "inventors" extant; but I have followed the Book of Leinster and the Annals of the Four Masters; and as criticism upon their entries would be out of place here for my present purpose, I shall, with your permission, reserve what I have to say as to the accuracy of the traditions thus recorded, for a future occasion.<sup>(2)</sup>

Rather than interrupt the foregoing list, I have been obliged to carry it down to a later date in the march of the country's progress in civilization; and I shall now go back again from the year of the world 4463, where I stopped, to the time of the great Ollamh Fodhla, who is recorded to have succeeded to the utensils, ornaments, and variously coloured dresses of Aiðill and Medhbh mentioned in the tale of the Táin Bó Chuailgne; the material or fashion of the dress not specified. Medhbh's preparation for the war of the first Táin; description of the parties summoned. Description of the Ultonian clans at the hill of Slemain, forming the army in pursuit of Aiðill and Medhbh, by the herald of the latter, Mac Roth, from the tale of the Táin Bó Chuailgne; his description of Conchobar Mac Nessa; of Causcraid Mend; of Sencha; of Eogan Mac Durthachta; of Laegaire Buadach; of Munremur; of Connud; of Reochaid; of Amargin; of Feradach Find Fechnach; of Fiachaig and Fiachna; of Celtchair Mac Uthair and his clann; of Eirrga Echbel; of Mend, son of Salchogan; of Fergna; of Ercc, son of Carpri Nia Fer and his clann; of Cuchulaind's clann. Note: Cuchulaind is removed to Muirtheimne after his fight with Ferdiadh, to get the benefit of the healing properties of its stream or river; enumeration of them; while there, Cethern, who had gone to his assistance, arrives covered with wounds, and is visited by physicians from the enemy's camp, whom he drives away; Cuchulaind then sends for Fingín Fathliagh, who examines each of his wounds, and Cethern describes the persons who gave them—his description of Illand, son of Fergus; of queen Medhbh; of Oil and Othine; of Bun and Mecconn; of Broen and Brudni, sons of Teora Soillsi, king of Caille; of Cormac [Mac] Colomarig and Cormac the son of Maelefoga; of Mane Mathremail and Mane Athremail, sons of Aiðill and Medhbh; of the champions from Iruade [Norway]; of Aiðill and his son Mane; of the marrow bath by which Cethern was healed, whence the name of Smirannair, now Smarmore, in the county Louth. Medhbh enumerates her dowry to Aiðill; gifts promised by her to Long Mac Emonis; gifts promised by her to Ferdiadh; one of those gifts, her celebrated brooch, weighed more than four pounds. Story of Mac Conglinde; his extravagant dream; his description of a curious dress of a doorkeeper; analysis of the dress—the Cochall, the Ionar, the Ochrath; analysis of Mac Conglinde's own dress; his Leinidh. Distinction between the Léine and the Leinidh—the latter was a kilt. Description of the dress of the champion Edchu Rond in the tale of the Exile of the Sons of Duidermait; he wore a kilt. Ancient law regulating the wearing of the Leinidh or kilt, and the Ochrath or pantaloons.

(2) [Professor O'Curry intended to have concluded the whole series of these Lectures by a critical examination of the authorities whose statements he followed in the course of his work. Unfortunately, the whole series was not destined to be completed before he was taken from amongst us.]

LECTURE XXIV. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT

ERINN

108—134

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Constant references to fringes of gold thread; mention of this ornament in the account of Medhbh's visit to her chief Druid in the commencement of the Táin Bó Chuailgne,—description of Fedelm the prophetess weaving a fringe; the fringe sword or lath mentioned in a poem of Dallan Forgaill (circa A.D. 560). Ancient laws relating to the pledging of ornaments, etc.; law relating to the pledging of a needle; the pledging of a queen's work bag; the work bag of an Airech Feibhe. The legal monarchy in the year of the world 3882, and died in the year 3922, after a reign of forty years.

Of Ollamh Fodhla (Monarch A. M. 3882-3922).

The original name of this prince was Eochaidh; but, from his great learning he obtained the distinction of Ollamh, or Doctor, before his accession to the throne; and after he became King of Erin, he was called Ollamh Fodhla, or "the Doctor of Fodhla", which was one of the ancient names of Erin.

Ollamh Fodhla erected a new court at Teamair, or Tara, which ever after was called Mur Ollamhan, or "Ollamh's Court". This court has been often represented to have been a college of Ollamhs, or learned Doctors; such, however, is not the meaning of the name, but, simply, the Court of King Ollamh himself.

That Ollamh Fodhla was a man of power and distinction as a legislator and a scholar, may be, I think, very fairly allowed, as we find this character given to him in a very ancient poem of thirty-two lines, preserved in the Book of Leinster, and ascribed to the Ultonian poet Ferceirtne, who was attached to the Court of Conor MacNessa, the celebrated King of Uladh, and flourished so long since as about the time of the Incarnation of our Lord.

This little piece contains evidence of the high antiquity of that Feast of Tara, which we shall presently see was, in fact, the supreme legislative assembly of ancient Erin; and thus refers to a very remote period indeed the existence of an institution which necessarily implies that high degree of civilization which the annalists always attribute to our early ancestors.

The poem was written to commemorate the name of Ollamh Fodhla, his three sons, and his descendants, who succeeded him one after another and occupied the sovereignty 210 years without interruption from any other family. As this poem appears to me to be certainly authentic, and of great historic value, I am tempted to give here a literal translation of the whole of it. It is as follows:—

" Ollamh Fodhla, of furious valour,
Who founded the Court of Ollamh,
Was the first heroic king
That instituted the Feast of Teamair.

" Forty sweet musical years
He held the high sovereignty of Erin;
And it was from him, with noble pride,
The Ultonians [or Olltonians] took their name.

" Six kings of valiant career
Of Ollamh's race reigned over Erin;
For two hundred and ten full years,
No other person came between them.

Antiquity of the Feast of Tara.

contents of a workbag formed only a small part of a lady's personal ornaments. References to dyeing, weaving, embroidering, etc., in the ancient laws regulating Distress; objects connected with those arts for the recovery of which proceedings might have been taken under those laws. Coloured thread and wool paid as rent or tribute. The dye-stuffs used were of home growth. Legend of St. Ciaran and the blue dye stuff called Glaisin. Summary of the processes in the textile arts mentioned in the extracts quoted in the lecture. Reference to embroidery in the tale of the Tochmarc nEimire, and in the Dinnseanchas. Coca the embroideress of St. Columcille. The knowledge of the Gaedhills about colours shown by the illuminations to the Book of Kells. Reference in the Book of Ballymote to the colours worn by different classes. Cloth of various colours formed part of the tributes or taxes paid as late as the ninth and tenth centuries. Tributes to the king of Caiseal according to the Book of Rights from: Ara; Boirinn; Leinster; Uathne; Duibhneach and Drung; Corcumruadh; the Deise; Orbraidhe. Stipends paid by the king of Caiseal to the kings of Kerry; Raithlenn; Ara. Tributes to the king of Connacht from Umhall; the Graegraidhe; the Conmaicne; the Ciarraidhe; the Luighne; the Dealbhna; Ui Maine. Stipends paid by the king of Connacht to the kings of: Dealbhna; Ui Maine. Tributes to the king of Aileach from: the Cuileantraidhe; the Ui Mic Caerthainn; Ui Tuirtre. Stipends paid by the king of Aileach to the kings of: Cinel Boghaine; Cinel Enanna; Craebh; Ui Mic Caerthainn; Tulach Og. Stipends paid by the king of Oriel to the kings of: Ui Breasail; Ui Eachach; Ui Meith; Ui Dortain; Ui Briuin Archoill; Ui Tuirtre; Feara Manach; Mughdhorn and Ros. Stipends paid by the king of Uladh to the kings of: Cuailgne; Araidhe; Cobhais; Muirtheimne. Tributes to the king of Uladh from: Senhne; Crothraidhe; Cathal. Gifts to the king of Tara. Stipends paid by the king of Tara to the kings of: Magh Lacha; Cuirne; Ui Beccon. Tributes to the king of Tara from: the Luighne; the Feara Arda; the Saithne; Gailenga; the Ui Beccon. Stipends paid by the king of Leinster to the: Ui Fealain; the chief of Cualann; Ui Feilmadha; king of Kaailinn; Ui Criomhthannan. Tributes to the king of Leinster from the: Galls; Forthuatha; Fotharta; men of South Leinster. Gifts from the monarch of Erin to the king of Emain Macha. Stipends of the king of Emain Macha to the kings of: Rathmor; Ui Briuin; Conmaicne. Gifts bestowed on the king of Leinster by the monarch of Erin whenever he visited Tara. Gift of the king of Leinster on his return from Tara to the king of Ui Fealain. Gifts of the monarch of Erin to the king of Caiseal when at Teamhair Luachra. Stipends given by the king of Caiseal at the visitation of the monarch of Erin to the: Deise; Ui Chonaill. Stipends paid by the king of Connacht to the kings of: Ui Maine; Luighne. Colours of winds, according to the preface to the Seanchas Mór.

- " Finnachta, and Slanoll the gifted;
 And Geidé of the great sweet voice;
Fiag; Ailill of the sharp gifted weapons;
 And the fierce warrior Berngal.
- ♥ He was an Ollamh (Doctor) by natural right,
 The powerful son of Fiacha Finscothach;
 Nobler than any king,—royal his face,—
 Of the race of Ir, son of Milidh.
- " The great Clann Rudhraidhé of brilliant fame,
 The valiant heroes of the Royal Branch,
 With all their loud deserved renown,
 Are, now, the descendants of Ollamh.
- " Labhradh Loingseach, with his ample force,
 Slew King Cobhthach in Dinnrigh,
 With a lance-armed host from beyond the sea;—
 From him the Lagenians [lit. lancemen] are named.
- " Eocho Mumho, greater than any other man,
 King of Erin, son of Mofemis;—
 From him Momonia of old was named.
 The name of Ultonia is from Ollamh".

To those who have felt the difficulty of authenticating the early history of Erin, this short simple poem will afford much more important information than may at first appear.

Of the identity of the author, Ferceirtné, and of the time at which he lived, no reasonable doubt can exist.

There are three poets and historians of this name found in a list of writers of Pagan Erin, preserved in the Book of Ballymote. The first Ferceirtné (as I have shown in a former lecture), was attached to the person and fortunes of Labhradh Loingseach, King of Leinster; the second, the present Ferceirtné, was attached to Conor MacNessa's court at Emania; and the third was attached to the court and person of Curoi MacDairé, King of West Munster, at Cathair Conroi (near Tralee, in Kerry). Curoi was of the Ultonian race, one of the heroes of the Royal Branch, and contemporary with Conor; and after the great champion's treacherous death at the hands of the other celebrated Ultonian warrior, Cuchulainn, Ferceirtné composed an elegy for the fallen hero, in which he celebrates his valour, his dignity, his honour, and his munificence to poets and scholars, besides describing in a long list his gifts and presents to himself.

There are two copies of this most curious and ancient poem preserved: one in a manuscript in the British Museum, (Egerton, 88), and another in Trinity College, Dublin, (H., 3, 18);

Difficulty of the language of poems attributed to Ferceirtné.

LECTURE XXV. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

135—154

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Of Conaire Mór, monarch of Erin (circa B.C. 100 to B.C. 50) and the outlawed sons of Dond Dess, according to the ancient tale of the Bruighean Daderga; the sons of Dond Dess associate with the British outlaw Ingcél to plunder the coasts of Britain and Erin; the monarch, in returning from Corca Bhaiscinn in the Co. Clare, being unable to reach Tara, goes to the court of Daderg; Ingcél visits the court to ascertain the feasibility of plundering it; he gives descriptions on his return to his companions of those he saw there, and Ferrogain identifies them; Ingcél's description of the Ultonian warrior Cormac Conloinges and his companions; of the Cruithenthuth or Picts; of the nine pipe players; of Tuidle the house steward; of Oball, Oblíni, and Coirpre Findmor, sons of Conaire Mór; of the champions Mal Mac Telbaind, Muinremor, and Birderg; of the great Ultonian champion Conall Cearnach; of the monarch himself, Conaire Mór; of the six cup bearers; of Tulchinne, the royal Druid and juggler; of the three swine-herds; of Causcrach Mend; of the Saxon princes and their companions; of the king's outriders; of the king's three judges; of the king's nine harpers; of the king's three jugglers; of the three chief cooks; of the king's three poets; of the king's two warders; of the king's nine guardsmen; of the king's two table attendants; of the champions Sencha, Dubhach Dael Uladh, and Goibniu; of Daderg himself; of the king's three door keepers; of the British exiles at the court of the monarch; of the three jesters or clowns; of the three drink bearers. Summary of the classes of persons described. The exaggerations of such descriptions scarcely affect their value for the present purpose; very little exaggeration on the whole in the tales of the Bruighean Daderga and Táin Bó Chualgne. Antiquity and long continued use of the colour of certain garments shown by the tale of the Amhra Chonraí, by Mac Liag's elegy on Tadhg O'Kelly, and also by a poem of Gillabrighe Mac Conmidhe.

LECTURE XXVI. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

155—170

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Very early mention of ornaments of gold, etc., e. g. in the description of Eladha the Fomorian king, in the second battle of Mugh Tuireadh. Champions sometimes wore a finger ring for each king killed. Allusion to bracelets in an ancient poetical name of the river Boyne. Ornaments mentioned in a description of a cavalcade given in an ancient preface to the Táin Bó Chualgne, and in the description of another cavalcade in the same tract. Some of the richest descriptions of gold and silver ornaments are to be found in the romantic tale of the "Wanderings of Maelduin's Canoe" (circa A.D. 700). Bronze Buidne for the hair in Dr. Petrie's collection. Ornaments described in the tale of the Tochmarc Bec Fola. Story of Aithirne Ailgisach, king Fergus

LECT. I.

but their style and diction are so antiquated as to place them beyond the comprehension of those Irish scholars who have either not been able, or have not undertaken the labour, to prepare for themselves glossaries and concordances from such other very ancient pieces of composition as have come down to our time. For, let me observe, that no acquaintance with the corrupt writings of Irish Bards of the last two hundred years, and no lexicon yet published, will be found of any value in dealing with this piece and others of its class, written as they were in forms of language so ancient and now so very obscure; and yet there are pretended Irish scholars of the present day, who never saw these most ancient writings, nor ever even heard of them but casually, and who nevertheless affect a familiarity with them, nay actually pretend to translate them, with a confidence in the public credulity which only ceases to surprise us because we know how often it has been successful in imposing on the ignorant.

But to return to the poem on Ollamh Fodhla: the points in it to which I would particularly desire attention are these:—the existence and antiquity of the great Feast of Teamair in the author's time (that is, the time of the Incarnation); the existence of the Craebh Ruadh, or House of the "Royal Branch", at the same time, at Emania; and, among other things, the origin of the names of Laighin (Leinster), Mumhain (Munster), and Uladh (Ulster).

Why, it may be asked, is not the origin of the name of Connacht found with the other three provincial names in this poem? This is a curious and I can assure you an important question in relation to the antiquity of the piece; but it can be answered positively by the fact that the name "Connacht" had not yet existed in the poet's time.

You will have seen that Ferceirtne derives the names of the three provinces from the names of distinguished men; but the province of Connacht, as it happens, was at this time called Ollnegmacht,—and did not receive the name of Connacht (or "the land of the descendants of Conn"), until after the time of Conn of the Hundred Battles, who died, Monarch of Erin, so late as the year of our Lord 157.

It is true that it was attempted in later times to give a romantic, or rather mythological, origin to the name Connacht. For in the same Book of Leinster we find recorded an ancient legend, which tells us that there ruled over Connacht, at some unknown period, a King whose name was Conn; that this King was one of the greatest Druids of his time; that not only was he able to resist all the druidical power of the Tuatha Dé

Of the name
of the province of Con-nacht.

- Fairge*, and the gold brooch found at Ard Brestine; the finding of ornaments unconnected with human remains explained by this tale. Mention of a large sized brooch in the legendary history of Queen Édain. Ancient law respecting the mode of wearing large brooches.
- * Large brooches mentioned in the tale of the "Wanderings of Maelduin's Canoe". Thistle headed or Scottish brooches; reference to Scottish brooches in the story of Cano son of Gartnan. Carved brooches mentioned in the tale of the Bruighean Daderga. Reference to a carved brooch in the Book of Munster. Another reference to a carved brooch in a poem ascribed to Oisín. Brooches of bronze and Findruine. Chased gold pins used down to the beginning of the thirteenth century. Of the different kinds of rings. The Fainne used to confine the hair. Hair rings-used in the seventeenth century. Fails were worn up the whole arm for the purpose of bestowing them upon poets, etc.; example of this from the Book of Lismore. Of the bracelet called a Budne, Buidne, or Buinne.

LECTURE XXVII. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

171—184

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Anonymous notice of Irish Torques; description of two found at Tara; accounts of Torques found in England; no account of Torques in the works of older Irish antiquaries; those found at Tara bought in 1818 by Alderman West of Dublin; the author does not agree with the anonymous as to the mode of production of the Tara Torques. Uses of the Tara Torques; reference to such a ring of gold for the waist in an ancient preface to the Táin Bó Chuailgne; another reference to such a ring in an account of a dispute about the manner of death of Fothadh Airgteach between king Mongan and the poet Dallan Forgaill from the Leabhar na h-Uidhre; Cailte's account of his mode of burial; a hoop or waist-torque among the ornaments placed on Fothadh's stone coffin. Story of Cormac Mac Airt and Lugaidh Lagá, showing one of the uses of rings worn on the hands. Ornaments for the neck; the Muinche; first used in the time of Orn-anhon (circa B.C. 1300); mentioned in a poem of Ferceirtne on Curoi Mac Daire; also in account of the Battle of Magh Leana. The Niamh Land or flat crescent of gold worn on the head, as well as on the neck. The Neck-Torque of Cormac Mac Airt. Descriptions of the dress and ornaments of Bec Fola. The Muinche mentioned in the tale of the "Wanderings of Maelduin's Canoe", and in the story of Cano. Muinche and Land used also for the neck ornaments of animals and spears. Use of the term Muintorcs. Of the Mael-Land mentioned in the Táin Bó Fraich. The ferrule of a spear called a Muinche in the account of the Battle of Magh Leana; discovery of such a ring in Kerry; the term also used for the collars of grayhounds, chiefly in Fenian tales. Mention of the Torc in its simple form in the Book of Leinster. Of the Land or lunette; it formed part of the legal contents of a lady's workbag, and of the inheritance of daughters. The Land was worn on the head as well

Danann, though often attempted against him, but became in turn their assailant with their own chosen weapons; that, having on one occasion carried off all their cattle, and pillaged and ruined their dwellings, in order to protect himself and to confound them the more, he enveloped himself and the whole province in a snow several feet deep; that thereupon the Tuatha Dé Danann addressed themselves to Dalach, the King's brother, who was also a Druid of high renown; that Dalach ordered them to slay three hundred white cows with red ears, to take out their livers, and heap or spread them upon a certain plain (in the present county of Roscommon), where he pronounced druidical orations on them; and that immediately their heat melted the snow all over the plain and the province; that this plain thereupon received the name of Magh Aoi, or the "Plain of the Livers", which it retained ever after; and that the province received the name of Conn-sneachta, or Conn's Snow, which name was afterwards reduced to the more euphonious form of Connachta.

It requires, I need hardly say, no argument to show the purely poetic character of this derivation of the name Connacht; and I think all will agree with me in preferring the authority of the illustrious scholar, the King-Bishop Cormac MacCullinan, who, in his celebrated Glossary, at the word Icht, derives the name Connacht as follows:

"Icht, id est, heads or children, ut est, Connachta, id est, Cond-Ichta, id est, the Children of Conn".<sup>(3)</sup>

This derivation is found more copiously sustained in the very ancient tract called Coir Anmann, or the Explanation of Names, of which copies are preserved in the Books of Ballymote, Lecain, etc. Thus says this tract:<sup>(4)</sup>

"Connachta, that is, Conn-Ichta, that is, the Ichta of Conn of the Hundred Battles; that is, the Children of Conn; for Icht is the same as Children, or Race.

"Or: Connacht, that is, the Acht of Conn; that is, the Act (or Deed) of Conn; because it was Conn that made forcible sword-land of it; and Acht is the same as a deed".

Here, then, are two important authorities—(Cormac MacCullinan, in the ninth century,—and the Book of Lecain),—to show that the name Connachta, (the People), and Connacht, (the Country), are derived from Conn of the Hundred Battles, who died in the year of our Lord 157; so that this name could not as on the neck, as shown by the descriptions of Conaire Mór's head charioteer and apprentice charioteers; and also of his poets.

<sup>(3)</sup> icht, edon cinn, no clann, ut est, Connachta edon conn-icht, edon clann Cuino.

<sup>(4)</sup> "Connachta .i. Connichta .i. ichta Chuino cet cathaich .i. clann Chuino. Nam icht .i. clann, no ceneil. no Connacht .i. acht Chuino .i. gnim Chuino, ar is eo roimsoir tui clannem is roimeir, ar is manao acht ocus gnim".

LECTURE XXVIII. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

185—198

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Of Ear-rings: the Au-Nasc mentioned in Cormac's Glossary, and in the accounts of Tulehinne the druid and juggler, and the harpers in the tale of the Bruighean Daderga. Of the Gibne: it was a badge of office, especially of charioteers; it is mentioned in the description of Rian Gabhra; Cuchulaind's charioteer; and also in a legend about him in Leabhar na h-Uidhre; the word Gibne is explained in an ancient glossary in a vellum MS.; the story of Edain and Midir shows that the Gibne was not worn exclusively by charioteers. The spiral ring for the hair mentioned in the "Wanderings of Maelduin's Canoe". Men as well as women divided the hair. Hollow golden balls fastened to the tresses of the hair; mention of such ornaments in the tale of the Bruighean Daderga; curious poem from the tale of Eochaidh Fedhleach and Edain (foot note); golden balls for the hair also mentioned in the "Sick Bed of Cuchulaind"; two such balls mentioned in the tales of Bec Fola and Bruighean Daderga, and only one in that of the "Sick Bed". The Mind oir or crown not a Land or crescent; it is mentioned in the Brehon Laws, and in a tale in the Leabhar na h-Uidhre; the second name used in the tale in question proves that the Mind covered the head. The Mind of Medb at the Táin Bó Chuailgne. The Mind was also worn in Scotland, as is shown by the story of prince Cano. Men also wore a golden Mind, as appears from the Táin Bó Chuailgne; this ornament called in other parts of the tale an Imscind. The curious Mind worn by Cormac Mac Airt at the meeting of the States at Uisnech.

LECTURE XXIX. OF DRESS AND ORNAMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

199—211

(VIII.) DRESS AND ORNAMENTS (continued). Story of a Mind called the Barr Bruinn in the tale of the Táin Bó Aingen. Another legend about the same Mind from the Book of Lismore; another celebrated Mind mentioned in the latter legend; origin of the ancient name of the Lakes of Killarney from that of Len Liny'hiacloch, the maker of this second Mind. The ancient goldsmiths appear to have worked at or near a gold mine. Len the goldsmith appears to have flourished circa B.C. 300. The names of ancient artists are generally derived from those of their arts, but that of Len is derived from a peculiarity of his teeth; this circumstance shows that he was not the legendary representative of his art, but a real artist. Gold ornaments found in a bog near Cullen in the county of Tipperary; circumstances under which they were found, and enumeration of the articles found—note. Cerdraighe or ancient territory of the goldsmiths near the present Cullen. Pedigree of the Cerdraighe of Tulach Gossa; this family of goldsmiths are brought down by this pedigree to circa A.D. 500; the eldest branch became extinct in St. Mo-

LECT. I.

be found in Ferceirtne's poem, who must have been dead about the same number of years before; and thus the tradition of the Feast of Teamair, found in Ferceirtne's verses, would be traced back at least to a period anterior to the Incarnation.

Of the Feis
of Tara.

According to Ferceirtne, then, Ollamh Fodhla was the first monarch that instituted the Feast of Teamair, or Tara; and besides the many allusions to this Feast, and to the authority of the triennial assembly of the powerful and learned men of Erin, we have the positive statement taken by Keting from ancient books (of which I on a former occasion<sup>(5)</sup> gave an account as having been still in existence in the time of that learned priest, though since lost to us), that the assembly of Tara was held at the beginning of November, every third year, and that it was a sort of parliament, at which all the nobles and principal scholars of Erin met, to institute new laws, or to renew and extend old ones, and to examine, to compare, and to correct the national annals and history of the country.

Military Organization under Ol-lamh Fodhla.

Ollamh Fodhla is stated<sup>(6)</sup> (by the same authorities) to have been the first that ordered a military leader, or captain, in every cantred, and a chief, or gentleman-farmer, in every village; all of whom were to do service to the monarch of Erin. He also ordered a particular place, according to rank, for every class that attended the great Feast of Teamair, an arrangement that continued without material alteration down to the abandonment of that ancient seat of the monarchy, in the sixth century of our era.

Of the still existing authorities on the subject of the Feast of Tara, as it was celebrated by the successors of Ollamh Fodhla, I shall here refer to some of the most important.

The following extract from a poem of Eochaidh O'Ciarain (who lived about the year of our Lord 1000) will give you an idea of the sort of order which was observed during the holding of the feast:—

“The Feast of Teamair every third year,
For the preservation of law and rule,
At that time was proudly held
By the illustrious kings of Erin.
“Cathair [Mór] the popular held
The far-famed Feast of Royal Teamair;
There assembled unto him, to his delight,
The men of Erin, to the one place.

<sup>(5)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 21.

<sup>(6)</sup> Annals of the Four Masters; A.M. 3922.

themnioc, circa A.D. 550; but other branches existed at a much later period. The mineral districts of Silvermines and Meanus are not far from Cullen. The At and the Cleitine. The Barr, Cennbarr, Eobarr, and Righbarr. The goldsmith in ancient times was only an artisan; other artisans of the same class. Creidine the first Cerd or goldsmith; his death mentioned in a poem of Flann of Monasterboice; this poem shows that foreign gold was at one time imported into Ireland. The first recorded smelter of gold in Ireland was a native of Wicklow. References to the making of specific articles not likely to be found in our chronicles; there is, however, abundant evidence of a belief that the metallic ornaments used in Ireland were of native manufacture.

LECTURE XXX. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IN ANCIENT

ERINN

212—233

(IX.) OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS. Antiquity of the harp in Erin. The first musical instrument mentioned in Gaelic writings is the Cruit, or harp, of the Daghda, a chief and druid of the Tuatha Dé Danann; his curious invocation to his harp; the three musical feats played upon it; examination of the names of this harp; the word Coir, forming part of the name of the Daghda's harp, came down to modern times, as is shown by a poem of Keating on Tadhg O'Coiffey, his harper. The Daghda's invocation to his harp further examined; the three musical modes compared to the three seasons of the year in ancient Egypt; myth of the discovery of the lyre; Dr. Burney on the three musical modes of the Greeks; the three Greek modes represented by the Irish three feats; conjectural completion of the text of the Daghda's invocation; what were the bellies and pipes of the Daghda's harp; ancient painting of a lyre at Portici, with a pipe or flute for cross-bar, mentioned by Dr. Burney. Legend of the origin of the three feats, or modes of harp playing, from the Táin Bó Fraich; meaning of the name Uaithne in this legend. No mention of strings in the account of the Daghda's harp, but they are mentioned in the tale of the Táin Bó Fraich. Legend of Find Mac Cumhaill; Scathach and her magical harp; Scathach's harp had three strings; no mention of music having been played at either of the battles of the northern or southern Magh Tuireadh; this proves the antiquity of those accounts. The Daghda's harp was quadrangular; a Greek harp of the same form represented in the hand of a Grecian Apollo at Rome; example of an Irish quadrangular harp on the Theca of an ancient missal. Dr. Ferguson on the antiquity and origin of music in Erin; musical canon of the Welsh regulated by Irish harpers about A.D. 1100; his account of the Theca above mentioned, and of figures of the harp from ancient Irish monumental crosses which resembled the old Egyptian one; he thinks this resemblance supports the Irish traditions; Irish MSS. little studied twenty years ago, but since they have been; from this examination the author thinks the Firbolgs and Tuatha Dé Danann had nothing to do with Egypt, but that the Milesians had. Migration of the Tuatha Dé

- "Three days before Samhain, at all times,
 And three days after, by ancient custom,
 Did the hosts of high aspirations
 Continue to feast for the whole week.
- "There was no theft, no wounding of the person,
 Among them, during all this time;
 No plying of weapons, no cutting,
 No evil word, no threatening boast.
- "Whoever was guilty of any of these Became a mortal, venomous foe;
 No gold for such crime was from him received,
 But his life on the immediate spot".

This quotation is taken from the thirteenth stanza of a poem of fifty-one stanzas written by O'Ciarain, on the origin of the name and ancient history of Loch Garman (now Wexford), preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain.

Although we have sufficient authority to show the time at which, and the person by whom, the great Feast of Teamair was instituted, still we have no detailed account, that I have seen, of the legislative arrangements of the meeting but what the Rev. Dr. Geoffrey Keting has left us; and although that honest compiler had access to many ancient and important books that are now lost to us, there is good reason to think that his account of the Feast of Teamair was obtained particularly from the ancient Leabhar na h-Ua Chongbhala, or Book of Navan, which was preserved at Kildare in his time.<sup>(7)</sup>

It may be observed that the arrangement of which Keting has preserved a detailed account could not have existed so early as in the time of Ollamh Fodhla; because the provincial kings were not yet fully established, nor down to the reign of the monarch Eochaidh Feidhlech, in the century immediately preceding the Incarnation.

The royal domain of Teamair was but of limited extent, down to the time of the monarch Tuathal (about the year of our Lord 80). With the restoration of the legitimate monarchy, and the suppression of the democratic revolution, Tuathal established the kingdom of Midhé, or Meath, to be the mensal lands of the future monarchs; and this he did without much injury or violence to the ancient provincial divisions originally made by the Firbolgs; for, as the provinces of Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connacht, met in a single point (at a great stone which stood upon the hill of Uisnech in Westmeath), so he cut

Of the royal domain of
 Tara.

<sup>(7)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc.; p. 13 (etc.).

Danann from Greece; the author does not believe they went into Scandinavia; he believes their cities of Falias, Gorias, etc., were in Germany; they spoke German, according to the Book of Lecan. The similarity of the harps on the monument of Orpheus at Petau in Styria and on the Theca of the Stowe MS. may point to Murrhart as the Murias of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

LECTURE XXXI. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IN ANCIENT
ERINN . . . . . 234—256

(IX.) OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). Legendary origin of the Harp according to the tale of Imtheacht na Trom Dhainhe, or the "Adventures of the Great Bardic Company"; Seanchan's visit to Guaire; interview of Marbhan, Guaire's brother, with Seanchan; Marbhan's legend of Cuil and Canoclach Mhór and the invention of the Harp; his legend of the invention of verse; his legend concerning the Timpan; the strand of Camas not identified. Signification of the word Cruit. The Irish Timpan was a stringed instrument. Another etymology for Cruit; Isidore not the authority for this explanation. Reference to the Cruit in the early history of the Milesians. Eimher and Ereamhon cast lots for a poet and harper. Skill in music one of the gifts of the Eberian or southern race of Eriinn. Mention of the Cruit in the historical tale of Orgain Dindrighe or the "destruction of Dindrigh". First occurrence of the word Ceis in this tale; it occurs again in connection with the assembly of Drom Ceat, A.D. 573; Aidbsi or Corus Cronáin mentioned in connection with poems in praise of St. Colum Cille, sung at this assembly; meaning of the word Aidbsi; the author heard the Cronán or throat accompaniment to dirges; origin of the word "crone"; the Irish Aidbsi known in Scotland as Cepóg; the word Cepóg known in Ireland also, as shown by a poem on the death of Athairne. The assembly of Drom Ceat continued; Dallan Forgaill's elegy on St. Colum Cille; the word Ceis occurs in this poem also; Ceis here represents a part of the harp, as shown by a scholium in Leabhar na h-Uidhre; antiquity of the tale of the "Destruction of Dindrigh" proved by this scholium; the word Ceis glossed in all ancient copies of the elegy on St. Colum Cille; scholium on the same poem in the MS. H. 2. 16. T.C.D.; gloss on the poem in Liber Hymnorum; parts of the harp surmised to have been the Ceis,—the Cobluighe or "sisters", and the Leithrind; Leithrind or half harmony, and Rind or full harmony; difficulty of determining what Ceis was; it was not a part of the harp; summary of the views of the commentators as to the meaning of Ceis. Fourth reference to the word Ceis in an ancient tale in Leabhar na h-Uidhre. Fifth reference to Ceis in another ancient poem. Coir, another term for harmony, synonymous with Ceis; the author concludes that Ceis meant either harmony, or the mode of playing with a bass. The word Gles mentioned in the scholium in H. 2. 16. is still a living word; the Crann Gleasta mentioned in a poem of the eighteenth century; this poem contains the names of the principal parts of the

LECT. I.

off from them their converging points, to a certain extent, and joined these to the old and limited territory of Bregia, in which Teamair originally stood; and it was after this that the old and new divisions of the new province took the geographical names of East and West Meath. Tuathal afterwards built a palace in each of these divisions cut off from the four provinces.<sup>(6)</sup>

Keting's description of the Feast of Tara, temp. Tuathal Teachtmair.

The following is the description of the Feast of Teamair, in the reign of Tuathal Teachtmair, as preserved by Keting:—

“The fourth of these royal residences was Teamair, which is situated in the part which was added from Leinster to Meath, where the feast of Teamair was held every third year, after they had made offerings to all their gods at Tlachta, as we have said above, preparatory to that Royal Convocation which was called the Feast of Teamair, at which they were accustomed to order laws and customs, and to test the Annals of Erin; so that such parts of them as were attested, were written by the chief ollamhs (or doctors) in the Roll of the Kings, which was called the Saltair of Teamair; and any other custom, or history of Erin which did not agree with this chief book, was not estimated as of truth. We shall not here recite particularly the laws or the customs which were ordered at the Feast of Teamair, because the Book of the People's Laws is full of them. I shall, however, set down here the order which was established at the Feast of Teamair for the distribution in their banquet halls, of the nobles and the warriors, when assembled at the feast.

“There was no Territorial Ollamh in History and Genealogy in Erin who did not write in the Roll of Teamair the names of the nobles who were lords of Territories, each according to his rank, as it was ordered at the Feast of Teamair; and every chief (or leader) of warriors who was retained to guard and protect the land of Erin had his name enrolled by the ollamh in like manner; and there was not one of these, either Lords of Territories or leaders, who was not attended by a shield-bearer.

“The form of their banquet halls was long and narrow, with tables at both sides of the house, and a rack on each side over the seats of the company, having only the breadth of a shield between every two hooks of it; and upon those hooks the genealogist suspended the shields of the nobles and warriors before they took their seats, each of them under his own shield, both noble and warrior. The lords of Territories, however, had a choice of the two sides; and the leaders (or captains) occupied the other; while the ollamhs and chief poets (his-harp; the names of the different classes of strings are only to be found in the scholium in the Leabhar na h-Uidhre to the elegy on St. Colum Cille.

(6) Vide MS. H. 3, 17. T.C.D.

LECTURE XXXII. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IN ANCIENT

ERINN

258—278

(IX.) MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). Reference to the different parts of a harp in a poem of the seventeenth century. The number of strings not mentioned in references to harps, except in two instances; the first is in the tale of the Iubar Mic Aingis or the "Yew Tree of Mac Aingis"; the instrument mentioned in this tale was not a Cruit, but a three stringed Timpan; the second reference is to be found in the Book of Lecan; and the instrument is eight stringed. The instrument called "Brian Boru's Harp" has thirty strings. Reference to a many stringed harp in the seventeenth century. Attention paid to the harp in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Reference to the Timpan as late as the seventeenth century, proving it to have been a stringed instrument. The Timpan was distinguished from the Cruit or full harp. No very ancient harp preserved. The harp in Trinity College, Dublin; Dr. Petrie's account of it; summary of Dr. Petrie's conclusions. Dr. Petrie's serious charge against the Chevalier O'Gorman. Some curious references to harps belonging to O'Briens which the author has met with: Mac Conmidhe's poem on Donnchadh Cairbreach O'Brien; Mac Conmidhe's poem on the harp of the same O'Brien; the poem does not explain how the harp went to Scotland. What became of this harp? Was it the harp presented by Henry the Eighth to the Earl of Clanrickard? Perhaps it suggested the harp-coinage, which was in circulation in Henry the Eighth's time. The Chevalier O'Gorman only mistook one Donogh O'Brien for another. There can be no doubt that this harp did once belong to the Earl of Clanrickard. If the harp was an O'Neill harp, how could its story have been invented and published in the lifetime of those concerned? Arthur O'Neill may have played upon the harp. But it could not have been his; this harp is not an O'Neill, but an O'Brien one; Dr. Petrie's antiquarian difficulties: author's answer; as to the monogram I. H. S.; as to the arms on the escutcheon. The assertion of Dr. Petrie, that the sept of O'Neill is more illustrious than that of O'Brien, is incorrect.

LECTURE XXXIII. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS IN ANCIENT ERINN

279—303

(IX.) MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). Donnchadh Cairbreach O'Brien sent some prized jewel to Scotland some time before Mac Conmidhe's mission for Donnchadh's harp. The Four Masters' account of the pursuit of Muireadhach O'Daly by O'Donnell; O'Daly sues for peace in three poems, and is forgiven; no copies of these poems existing in Ireland; two of them are at Oxford. The Four Masters' account of O'Daly's banishment not accurate; his poems to Clanrickard and O'Brien give some particulars of his flight. Poem of O'Daly to Morogh O'Brien, giving some account of torians, genealogists, judges, musicians, etc.) occupied the upper end; and the attendants who waited on the guests, the lower. LECT. I.

THE FEIS
OF TARA.

"It was the custom, too, that no one of them sat opposite to another, but every one with his back to the wall, both lords of Territories and leaders, under their own shields.

"It was not their custom to have women in their banquet halls; they had a separate place for themselves, where they were attended to.

"It was their custom also, that preparatory to the serving of the banquet all should leave the house but three,—namely, a genealogist; a marshal of the house; and a trumpeter with his horn, to call the company in. This trumpeter sounded his horn three times. At the first blast the shield-bearers of the nobles assembled round the door of the banquet hall, and the marshal of the house received the shield of each noble, and under the direction of the genealogist placed each shield in its own proper place. The trumpeter then sounded the second blast, when the shield-bearers of the warriors came to the door of the banquet hall, and the marshal received the shields from them, and placed them, under the direction of the genealogist, on the other side of the house, over the table of the warriors.

"The trumpeter afterwards sounded the third blast, at which the nobles and warriors assembled in the banquet hall, and each took his seat under his own shield, so that there was neither confusion nor contention for places among them".

So far Dr. Keting, from his ancient authorities, on the ordinary festive arrangements of the great Feast of Teamair, in the time of Tuathal Teachtmair; but he quotes another short article on the arrangements of the feast on a state occasion of special importance, under Laeghairé MacNeill, who was the monarch of Erin at the time of Saint Patrick's arrival:—

Keting's description of the same Feast, temp. Laeghairé MacNeill.

"The Feast of Teamair was convoked by Laeghairé to renew the customs and the laws of Erin, in conformity with the practice of the monarchs who preceded him.

"When the nobles and learned men of Erin came to this assembly, the chief King, or Monarch, with his court, occupied a separate palace, namely, the Teach Míodhchuarta, or great Banqueting Hall; and each of the provincial kings had a separate palace too. The King of Munster had the Long Mumhan, or Munster House; the King of Leinster had the Long Laighean, or Leinster House; the King of Connacht had the Coisir Chonnachtact, or Connacht Banqueting House; and the King of Ulster had the Eachrais Uladh, or Assembly House of Ulster.

the poet after his flight to Scotland. The poet Brian O'Higgins and David Roche of Fermoy. O'Higgins writes a poem to him which is in the Book of Fermoy; this poem gives a somewhat different account of O'Daly's return from that of the Four Masters. O'Daly was perhaps not allowed to leave Scotland without ransom; what was the jewel paid as this ransom? The author believes that it was the harp of O'Brien. This harp did not come back to Ireland directly, and may have passed into the hands of Edward the First, and have been given by Henry the Eighth to Clanrickard. The armorial bearings and monogram not of the same age as the harp. Objects of the author in the previous discussion. Poem on another straying harp of an O'Brien, written in 1570; the O'Brien was Conor Earl of Thomond; the Four Masters' account of his submission to Queen Elizabeth; it was during his short absence that his harp passed into strange hands; the harp in T.C.D. not this harp. Mr. Lanigan's harp. Owners of rare antiquities should place them for a time in the museum of the R.I.A. Some notes on Irish harps by Dr. Petrie.—"He regrets the absence of any ancient harp"; "present indifference to Irish harps and music"; "some ecclesiastical relics preserved"; Dr. Petrie would have preferred the harp of St. Patrick or St. Kevin; "our bogs may yet give us an ancient harp"; Mr. Joy's account of such a harp found in the county Limerick; according to Dr. Petrie, this harp was at least 1,000 years old. What has become of the harps of 1782 and 1792? A harp of 1509. "Brian Boru's" harp is the oldest of those known; the Dalway harp is next in age; the inscriptions on this harp imperfectly translated in Mr. Joy's essay. Professor O'Curry's translation of them; Mr. Joy's description of this harp. The harp of the Marquis of Kildare. Harps of the eighteenth century: the one in the possession of Sir Hervey Bruce; the Castle Otway harp; a harp formerly belonging to Mr. Hehir of Limerick; a Magennis harp seen by Dr. Petrie in 1832; the harp in the possession of Sir G. Hodson; the harp in the museum of the R.I.A. purchased from Major Sirr; the so-called harp of Carolan in the museum of the R.I.A. The harps of the present century all made by Egan; one of them in Dr. Petrie's possession. Dr. Petrie's opinion of the exertions of the Harp Society of Belfast. "The Irish harp is dead for ever, but the music won't die". The harp in Scotland known as that of Mary Queen of Scots. Rev. Mr. Mac Lauchlan's "Book of the Dean of Lismore"; it contains three poems ascribed to O'Daly or Muireadhach Albanach; Mr. Mac Lauchlan's note on this poet; his description of one of the poems incorrect as regards O'Daly; Mr. Mac Lauchlan not aware that Muireadhach Albanach was an Irishman. The author has collected all that he believes authentic on the Cruit. The statements about ancient Irish music and musical instruments of Walker and Bunting of no value; these writers did not know the Irish language; the author regrets to have to speak thus of the work of one who has rescued so much of our music.

" There were three other buildings at Teamair at this time. The first was Carcair na n-Giall, or the Prison of the Hostages, where the monarch's hostages were kept. The second was Realta na bh-Filiodh, or the Star of the Poets, where the judges and poets of Erin sat to dispense justice to those who were charged with breaches of the laws and regulations of the country. The third was Grianan na n-Inghean, or the Sunny House of the Women, where the provincial queens were lodged, each with her own attendants, in separate sections of the establishment.

" When, however, the great assembly sat to enact or confirm the national laws and customs, the Teach Míodhchuarta, or great Banqueting Hall, was the seat of their deliberations. The following was the order in which they sat in that house:—The King of Erin sat in the centre of the hall, with his face to the west; and the King of Munster on the south side of him, for it was to the east and to the west that the two ends of the house looked; the King of Leinster sat opposite him; the King of Connacht behind him; and the Ollamhs (or learned Doctors) of Erin behind the King of Connacht; while the King of Ulster sat on the north side, on the Monarch's right hand; those kings being each attended by a select party of their most distinguished nobles. And this arrangement is manifest from the old heraldry which had been established in Erin in the ancient times. The following is an exemplification of this fact, as given briefly by an ancient poet:—

- " The men of Munster on the south side, Without injustice, without constraint;
And the men of Leinster, full of strength,
Face to face with their High King.
- " The Connacht men at the monarch's back,
They who in history preserved all truth;
The chief of Dal Áraidhé, among the rest,
Sat in a distinguished separate place.
- " The right hand of Teamair's powerful king,
Without injustice, without reproach,
To the Oírellians doth belong,
Without decision of law, without dispute".

So far Keting. The three verses which he quotes are the second, third, and fourth stanzas of an anonymous poem of thirty-two stanzas, which describes the peculiar privileges of the Oírellians, or Clan Colla; as granted to them by Diarmait, the son of Fergus Cerrbheoil (the last monarch that resided

LECTURE XXXIV. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS 804—826

(IX.) OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). Names of musical instruments found in our MSS.—The Benn-Buabhaill; the Corn-Buabhaill a drinking horn The Benn-Chroit. The Buinne. The Coir-Ceathairchuir. The Corn; the Cornaire or horn-player mentioned in the Táin Bó Fraich, in the “Courtship of Ferb”, and in a legendary version of the Book of Genesis; no reference to trumpets in the Táin Bó Chuailgne, but the playing of harps in the encampments is mentioned; instance of musicians in the trains of kings and chiefs on military expeditions:—the Battle of Almhain and the legend of Dondbo. Musical instruments mentioned in the Tale of the Battle of Almhain, and in the poem on the Fair of Carman. The Cornaire, or horn-blower, also mentioned in the poem on the Banqueting-House of Tara. The Craebh-Ciúil, or Musical Branch, mentioned in the Tale of Fled Bricrind or “Bricriu's Feast”; the musical branch a symbol of poets and used for commanding silence, as shown by the Tales of “Bricriu's Feast”, and the “Courtship of Emer”; the Musical Branch mentioned in the Tale of the “Dialogue of the Two Sages”; and also in the Tale of the “Finding of Cormac's Branch”; and lastly in a poem of about the year A.D. 1500; the Musical Branch symbolical of repose and peace; it was analogous to the Turkish silver crescent and bells; some bronze bells in the museum of the R.I.A. belonged perhaps to such an instrument. The bells called “Crotals” described in the Penny Journal; Dr. Petrie's observations thereon; “Crotals” not used by Christian priests; explanation of the term; the Irish words crothadh, crothla, and clothra; they are the only words at all like crotalum, except crotal, the husks of fruit, i.e. castanets; bells put on the necks of cows, and on horses; the Crotal not known in Ireland. The Crann-Ciúil, or Musical Tree; it was a generic term for any kind of musical instrument, e.g. a Cruit, a Cuisle, or tube, or a Timpan. The Cuiseach: mentioned in the poem on the Fair of Carman, and in the Tale of the Battle of Almhain. The Cuisle Ciúil another name for Crann Ciúil; Cuisle a living word meaning a vein, or a kind of cock: mentioned in the Book of Invasions; Cuisle explained in H. 3. 18. T.C.D., as a Musical Tree.

LECTURE XXXV. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS 327—350

(IX.) OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). The Fedán; mentioned in the Book of Lismore; Fedán players mentioned in the Brehon Laws. The Fidil or Fiddle; mentioned in the poem on the fair of Carman, and in a poem written in 1680. The Guth-Buinne; mentioned in an Irish life of Alexander the Great; the Ceólán also mentioned in this tract; incorrect meaning given to this word in Macleod's and Dewar's Dictionary; Ceólán not a diminutive of ceol, but the name of a tinkling bell; the Ceólán mentioned in the Irish life of St. Mac Creiche. The Guthbuinne also mentioned in an Irish tract on the Siege of Troy. The Ocht Tedach. The Oircin; mentioned in the Irish Triads; one of the bards of Seanchán Tor- at Tara, and who died in the year 558), and confirmed to them by the monarch Domnall, son of Aedh, (who died, 639).<sup>(9)</sup> LECT. I.

These stanzas are of very great interest, not only in carrying back Keting's account of the Feast of Teamair more than a thousand years beyond his own time, but because also they present two historical facts on which it is to be regretted that that honest writer and profound Irish scholar did not offer some criticism or explanation, as they do not exactly agree with the prose account. An examination of this discrepancy will be found important in connection with my present purpose.

It will have been perceived that while the prose piece places the King of Ulster on the monarch's right hand in the great council of the nation, according to the strict precedence of more ancient territorial designation, the poem gives that place to the King of Oirghialla, or Oriell.

This discrepancy proves that the prose is the more ancient composition; indeed that it must originally have been written before the year of our Lord 331, for it was only down to that time that the ancient kingdom of Ulster remained intact, and had its proper royal representative at Teamair. In that year, 331, the three brothers Colla, of the Eremonian race, overthrew the Ultonians (who were of the Irian race) at the great battle of Carn Achaidh Lethderg, (in Farney, in the present county of Monaghan), and wrested the sovereignty of the province from them, excepting only the parts comprised in the present counties of Antrim and Down; and into that district they drove the surviving remnant of the Irians, over the river Righ. This smaller territory, inhabited by the original race of Ulster, denominated Ulidia by modern writers (to distinguish it from the rest of the province of Ulster), subsequently obtained the distinctive, though not permanent, name of Oirghiall, (Anglicised Uriell and Oriell). Of the Kingdom of Oirghialla, or Oriell.

The people of Ulidia, too, or the true Ultonians, received another name—that of Dal Araidhé, (Anglicised or Latinised Dal Arádia)—from Fiacha Araidhé, King of all Ulster about the year of our Lord 240; whose descendants continued to be petty kings or lords of the smaller territory of Uladh down to the Anglo-Norman invasion; and who are represented at the present day by the Mac Ennises, or Magennises, of Iveagh, in the county of Down. Of the Dal Araidhé.

The last Feast of Tara was held A.D. 554, and the last king of the Dal Araidhé died in 558, the same year in which died

<sup>(9)</sup> There is a copy of this poem preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, beginning:—a eolca an domain uanaig.—"Ye learned of the poetic world".)

peist's "Great Bardic Company" called Oircne; no explanation of Oircne known, except that it was the name of the first lap-dog. Of the Pip or Pipe, and in the plural Pipai or Pipes; mentioned in the poem on the Fair of Carman; the only ancient reference to the Pipaíreadha, or Piobaire, or Piper, known to author is in a fragment of Brehon Law. Of the Stoc; mentioned in a paraphrase of the Book of Genesis in the Leabhar Breac, and in the version of the "Fall of Jericho" in the same book; and again in describing the coming of Antichrist; and in the plural form Stuic in the poem on the Fair of Carman, and in the Táin Bó Flidais. Another instrument, the Sturgan, mentioned in this tract; and also in a poem on Randal lord of Arran. The Sturganuidhe or Sturgan player mentioned in Keating's "Three Shafts of Death". Specimens of the Corn, Stoc, and Sturgan are probably to be found in the Museum of the R.I.A. The Corn was the Roman Cornua. The Stoc represents the Roman Buccina. The Sturgan corresponds to the Roman Lituus. Mr. R. Ousley's description of the Stuic and the Sturgana in the Museum of the R.I.A. Ancient Irish wind instruments of graduated scale and compass; the trumpets mentioned in Walker's Irish Bards first described and figured in Smith's History of Cork; Walker's observations on them; they are figured in Vetusta Monumenta; a similar trumpet found in England; the author agrees with Walker that there must have been another joint in the trumpets; discrepancy between the figures of Smith and the Vetusta Monumenta; Smith's opinion that they were Danish, erroneous; Smith's error that the Cork trumpets formed but one instrument, reproduced by Mr. R. MacAdam; Sir W. Wilde's novel idea of the use of the straight tubes; his idea that they were part of a "Commander's Staff", borrowed from Wagner; Sir William Wilde's illustration of the use of the straight part of a trumpet as a "Commander's Staff", unsatisfactory; his separation of the straight tube from the curved parts in the Museum of the R.I.A. a mistake which ought to be corrected. Sturgana, Stuic, and Corna in the Museums of the Royal Irish Academy, and Trinity College, Dublin.

LECTURE XXXVI. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS 351—363

(IX.) MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). The word Teillin, the name of a harp in Welsh, is not applied in Gaedhelic to a musical instrument; meaning of Telyn according to Owen's Welsh Dictionary; Telyn originally perhaps a derisive name; Caradoc's account of the introduction of harp music from Ireland into Wales; author unable to find what Welsh word Caradoc used for harp; the Telyn and Cruth were the Cruit and Timpan of Ireland; Owen's definition of a Welsh Cruit. The Irish Cruit was a lyre, and not a cithara. The Welsh Crud or Crowd could not represent the Irish Cruit. The Welsh word Telyn apparently the same as the Irish Teillin, applied to the humming bee and humble bee; Teillin occurs in the Dinnseanchas; also in a poem about Marbhan and Guaire; and in one by O'Donnelly written about 1680. The word Teillin

LECT. I. the monarch Diarmait, son of Fergus, in whose time Teamair was cursed by Saint Ruadhan, and with whose death it ceased to be a royal residence.

It is evident, then, that this poem must have been originally written after the year 332, when Colla Uais took the dignity of king of Ulster, and before the year 558, the last year in which the petty king of Dal Araidh could have occupied the distinguished separate place at the Feast assigned to him by it.

Cormac Mac Airt at the Feast of Tara.

The following brief sketch of the celebrated monarch, Cormac Mac Airt, as he appeared at one of those Feasts of Teamair, is preserved in the Book of Ballymote, in the Royal Irish Academy (folio 142); and taken from the more ancient Leabhar na h-Ua Chongbhala, or Book of Navan, already mentioned:<sup>(10)</sup>

"A noble illustrious king took the sovereignty and rule over Erin at another time; namely, Cormac, the grandson of Conn.

"The world was replete with all that was good in his time. The fruit and fat of the land, and the gifts of the sea, were in abundance in this king's reign. There were neither woundings nor robberies in his time, but every one enjoyed his own in peace.

"The nobles of the men of Erin came to drink the Feast of Teamair at a certain time. These were the kings who presided at the Feast, namely: Fergus the Blacktoothed, and Eochaidh Gunnat, the two Kings of Ulster; Dunlaing, the son of Enna Niadh, King of Leinster; Cormac Cas [the ancestor of the Dal-cassians], son of Oilill Oluim, and Fiacha Muilleathan, the son of Eoghan [son of Oilill Oluim], the two Kings of Munster; Nia Mór, son of Lughaidh Fírtri, the son of Cormac's own mother, and Aedh, the son of Eochaidh, son of Conall, the two Kings of Connacht; Aengus Gaifuiltech [or of the 'Bloody Spear'], King of Bregia [or East Meath]; and Fearadhach, the son of Assal, son of Conn the Champion, King of [West] Meath.

"This was the state in which fairs and assemblies were attended by the men of Erin at this time: Every king was clad in his royal robes, and with his golden helmet on his head; for they did not put on their royal crowns but in the field of battle only.

"Splendidly did Cormac come into this great assembly; for the equal of his form had not appeared, excepting Conairé Mór, son of Eidersgeal; or Concobar, the son of Cathbadh; or Aengus, the son of the Daghda.

(10) The original of this extract has been printed in the Appendix, No. xxvi., to the former course of Lectures; (Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 510).

applied to the humming of bees ; it has become obsolete in Ireland, but not in Scotland ; occurs in the Highland Society's dictionary as Seilleán. Telyn could not be a modification of the Greek Chelys. Some think the fiddle represents the ancient Cruit ; the poem on the Fair of Carman proves this to be erroneous. Of the Timpan : Cor-mac's derivation of this word gives us the materials of which the instrument was made ; the Timpan mentioned in an ancient paraphrase of the Book of Exodus ; also in the Tale of the Battle of Magh Lena ; and in that of the Exile of the Sons of Duál Dermaid ; another reference in the Dialogue of the Ancient Men ; the passage in the latter the only one which explains Lethrind ; in this passage Lethrind signifies the treble part ; another description of the Timpan given in the Siege of Dromdamhghaire. The Timpan was a stringed instrument played with a bow ; this is fully confirmed by a passage from a vellum MS. compiled by Edmund O'Deórain in 1509. The same person may have played the harp and Timpan, but they were two distinct professions. The Timpan came down to the seventeenth century. Important passage from the Brehon Law respecting the Timpanist ; it would appear from this that, in addition to the bow, the deeper strings were struck with the nail. Harpers and Timpanists are separately mentioned in the Tochmarc Emere. The harper alone always considered of the rank of a Bó Aire ; the timpanist, only when chief Timpanist of a king. Relative powers of the harp and Timpan illustrated by a legend from the Book of Lismore. Professional names of musical performers ; the Buinnire ; the Cnaimh-Fhear ; the Cornair ; the Cruitire ; the Cuisleinnach ; the Feddnach ; the Fer Cengail ; the Grace ; the Pipaire ; the Stocaire ; the Sturganaidhe ; the Timpanach.

LECTURE XXXVII. OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS 370—389

(IX.) OF MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS (continued). The particular kinds of music mentioned in ancient manuscripts : the Aidbsi ; the Cepóc. Cepóc only another name for Aidbsi ; the word Cepóc used in Ireland also, as shown by the Tale of "Mac Dathó's Pig", and in an elegy on Aithirne the poet. Aidbsi or Cepóc a kind of Cronán or guttural murmur. The Certan referred to particularly in the Cain Adamhnain. The Cronán, mentioned in the account of the assembly of Drom Ceat ; and also in the Adventures of the "Great Bardic Company". The Crann-Dord ; it consisted of an accompaniment produced by the clashing of spear handles, as shown by a passage in the Táin Bó Chuailgne ; and in a legend from the Book of Lismore in which the term occurs. Other musical terms used in this tale : the Dordán ; the Fodord ; the Abran ; the Fead ; the Dord Fiansa ; the Dord ; the Fiansa ; the Andord ; the latter word occurs in the Tale of the "Sons of Uisnech" ; this passage shows that the pagan Gaedhil sang and played in chorus and in concert ; though Dord and its derivatives imply music, the word Dordán was applied to the notes of thrushes. Character of the Crann-Dord shown by a passage from the "Dialogue of the Ancient Men" ; and by “ Beautiful was the appearance of Cormac in that assembly. Flowing slightly curling golden hair, upon him. A red buckler, with stars and animals of gold and fastenings of silver, upon him. A crimson cloak in wide descending folds upon him, fastened at his breast by a golden brooch set with precious stones. A neck-torque of gold around his neck. A white shirt, with a full collar, and intertwined with red gold thread, upon him. A girdle of gold inlaid with precious stones around him. Two wonderful shoes of gold, with runnings of gold, upon him. Two spears with golden sockets, in his hand, and with many rivets of red bronze. And he was, besides, himself symmetrical and beautiful of form, without blemish or reproach”. LECT. I.

I have quoted, it will be observed, in the course of this Lecture, from the Rev. Geoffrey Keting's History of Erin, — a work written in the native Gaedhelic about the year 1630, — as an authority; and as the authority of that eminent scholar is even still but very insufficiently acknowledged at the present day, and lest any one should be led to suppose that he took occasion to draw on his imagination, for want of original authorities, in the compilation of the valuable work to which I have referred, I shall here repeat a list, which I gave on a former occasion, of the great ancient books which he had before him: — The Book of Armagh; the Book of Dromsnechta, or extracts from it; the Saltair of Cashel; the Leabhar na h-Uidhré of St. Ciaran; the Red Book of the Mac Egans; the Book of Glenn-dá-Iocha; the Book of Lecaoín (in Ormond); the Annals of the ancient Church of Cluain Eidnech; the Book of the Ua Chongbhail (or of Navan); the Book of St. Fintán, of Cluain Eidnech; the Yellow Book of St. Moling; and the Black Book of St. Molaga. His authorities were more full by far than those which now remain to us; and of the credit due to a man of Dr. Keting's character as well as learning I apprehend no one can suggest a doubt. It is perfectly certain that he has told us only what he found recorded. Dr. Keting's authorities.

I have so far endeavoured to abstract as authentic, clear, and concise an account as I could, of the institution and arrangements of the great Feast or Convocation of the States of Erin, at Teamar; which continued to meet, and to make or renew the general laws of the country, during the long term of 1800 years, according to the chronology of the Four Masters. We have seen who the personages were who, in right of their rank or their profession, sat as legislators in that famous assembly in the time of paganism. They were: the Monarch; the Provincial Kings; the nobles, or Chiefs of Territories; the chief

LECT. I.

Judges; the chief Poets; and the chief general Scholars of the nation. In short, the legislative assembly appears to have been at this remote period not only a representative assembly, but one as popular as the existing distinction of classes could with any propriety have allowed it to be.

Tradition of the bringing of the law of Moses from Egypt.

It is stated in very old copies of the "Book of Invasions", and other ancient documents, that it was the Mosaic law that the Milesians brought into Erin at their coming; that it had been learned and received from Moses, in Egypt, by Cae "Cain Breathach", [Cae, "of the Fair Judgments"], who was himself an Israelite, but had been sent into Egypt to learn the language of that country by the great Master Fenius Farsaidh, [Fenius "the Antiquarian"], from whom the Milesian brothers who conquered Erin are recorded to have been the twenty-second generation in descent; and it is stated in the preface to the Seanchas Mór that this was the law of Erin at the time of the coming of St. Patrick, in 432.

It is also stated in the preface to the Seanchas Mór, as well as in a quotation in the Book of Ballymote, in the Royal Irish Academy, and in the Yellow Book of Lecain (H. 2, 16, in Trinity College Library), [taken from the more ancient Leabhar na h-Ua Chongbhala, (or Book of Navan)], that from the time that Amergin, the son of Milesius, gave judgment between his brothers Eber and Eremon, on their arrival in Erin, concerning the division of the produce of a certain chase in which their respective people took part, the office of Brehon or judge was conceded to the poetic or philosophic profession; and that it so continued down to the time of Concobar Mac Nessa, King of Ulster, who was contemporary with our Saviour.

The Profession of Poet-Judges deprived of their privileges, temp.
Concobar
Mac Nessa.

It would appear that for some time before this period the learned Poet-Judges were accustomed to deliver their judgments in language so obscure as to be almost unintelligible to the kings, nobles, and chiefs, who attended at the Airechts, or courts. It happened that a great contest took place in Concobar's time, at Emania, the royal palace of Ulster, between Aithirné, the chief poet and satirist of that province, and Neidhé, the son of Adhna; as to which of them should wear the Tuidhen Filidh, or poet's gown, and occupy the poet's chair at court, a post which had been just left vacant by the death of Neidhé's father. This contest or discussion was a public one; and it was carried on between the learned antagonists in so obscure a style of language and construction, that the attending multitude must have felt disappointed at not being able to understand it. King Concobar, who was present all the time, felt so much annoyed at not understanding the discussion himself, that, with the consent of his assembled people, he made an order, that for the future the office of judge should no longer be confined to the professors of the poetic art, but should be open to all who qualified themselves for it, not however excluding the poets in their natural turn. This order was adopted throughout the whole nation, and produced immediate and wonderful effects. The office of judge became thenceforth an object of ambition and emulation, and numbers of talented men, as well as even some women too, were called to it, by the unanimous voice of kings, chiefs, and people.

Of some of the more remarkable of these judges a short list has been preserved in the preface to the Seanchas Mór; but the greater number of those whose names are preserved in these MSS., belonged chiefly to Ulster, and to the first century.

Among these were the parties in the above discussion, Neidhé and Aithirné, who had of course to change their language in future. We have then: Fergus the poet, son of Aithirné;—Sean MacAidhné;—Seancha;—and Brigh, his daughter, who criticised and corrected her father's errors;—Fachtna the wise, son of this Seancha;—Eoghan Mac Durthacht, King, or Chief of Fearnmhaighe (now Farney in the county Monaghan);—Eochaidh Mac Luchta, King of North Munster;—Fergus Fiannaité, from the district of Fiannait (near Tralee, in Kerry);—and Connla Cain-Breathach [i.e., "of the mild judgments"] of Connacht. It was this Connla that held a celebrated contest with the Druids, who asserted that they were the creators of the heavens and the earth; but they were defeated by Connla, who challenged them to prove their great powers by causing the sun and moon to appear in the north; this, of course, was not done, and the Druids were confounded.

In the first century also flourished Feradach "Finn Feacht-nach", [i.e. "the fair and righteous"], who became monarch of Erin in A.D. 36. He is mentioned in the preface to the Seanchas Mór, as well as in all our ancient books, as an eminent judge. The celebrated Morann—(of the fabulous collar, which is said to have tightened on his neck when falling into the delivery of an erroneous judgment),—was the official judge and adviser of this monarch Feradach. Morann's instructions to his son and successor, Néré, on the qualifications and duties of a judge, are still extant, and will, probably, appear in the forthcoming publication of the Brehon Law Commission.

We next find Sencha, the son of Ailill, occupying the place of Judge to the monarch Tuathal Techtmar, whose reign closed in the year of our Lord 106.

Feidhlimidh Reachtmar, the son of Tuathal, succeeded to the Account of the more remarkable Judges of Erin, from the Seanchas Mór.

LECT. I. monarchy in the year 111, and died in the year 119. He received the surname of Rechtmhar, (or "the lawgiver"), from his having in his reign introduced into Erin the Lex Talionis, which ordered payment in kind for all injuries; such as, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, an arm for an arm, a cow for a cow, and so on.

Conn "of the Hundred Battles" succeeded to the monarchy in the year 123. Conn had, attached to his court, a remarkable chief judge, a wealthy member of his own family—who bore the strange name of Caratniad "of the false judgments". This title referred only, however, to the unusual literary form in which he delivered them, which appears to have been of the strangest. For we are told that every cause that came for adjudication to the monarch was handed over by him to Caratniad, who delivered his decisions in such a way as that they always appeared at first to be false and unjust, but which decisions upon critical examination were always found to be strictly just and legal.

We may pass over the reign of Art, son of Conn; and of his immediate successor, MacCon, who was his own Judge; and come down to Cormac, the son of Art, and grandson of Conn, who came to the monarchy in the year 227, and died in the year 266.

So much has been said of Cormac, in my former lectures, that I need only repeat here that he was one of the ablest, if not absolutely the wisest, of all the monarchs of Erin down to his time. He was not only a judge and lawyer, but he himself compiled an abstract of all the ancient laws of the country for the special use of his son and successor Cairbré Liffeachair. This book was compiled at Acaill (now the hill of Screen, near Tara), and has on that account been called the "Book of Acaill". There are copies of large fragments of it, if not of the whole book, extant at this day; but as I have described it in a former lecture, it is not necessary to do more than refer to it here.<sup>(11)</sup>

Cormac, though himself, according to Cuan O'Lochain's poem, a most eminent judge, had also an eminent chief judge and adviser in the wise and acute Fithal, and after him in his prudent and learned son Flaithri.

There is a curious and very ancient little tract preserved in the Book of Leinster, under the name of Sean-raidhte Fithil (that is, "the old, or wise, sayings of Fithal"), consisting of a series of moral, philosophical, and legal maxims, said to have been spoken by the wise Fithal to his great master Cormac.

<sup>(11)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History, pp. 47, 49.

It was King Cormac, according to Keting, that made an order that all future monarchs of Erin should be at all times accompanied by ten persons, consisting of a chief, a judge, a druid, a doctor, a poet, an historian, a musician, and three servants. The chief was to sit at the king's shoulder; the judge, to explain the laws and customs of the country in the king's presence; the druid, for sacrifice and prophecy, of good or evil, to the country, by his pagan knowledge; the doctor, for attending to the health of the king, queen, and household; the poet, for lauding or satirizing all persons according to their deserts; the historian, to preserve the genealogical branches, and the history and actions of the nobles, from time to time; the musician, to play the harp, and sing songs and poems before the king; the three chief servants, with a sufficient company of assistants, to attend on the king and his company at table.

LECT. I.
King Cormac's order regulating the household of a Monarch.

This order continued in force from Cormac's time to the death of the great monarch Brian Boroiu, in the year 1014; but in the Christian times a bishop took the place of the druid among the king's attendants.

Keting quotes an ancient poem for this arrangement, but the extract contains nothing more than he gives in this prose.

We have no account of any change in, or addition to, the ancient laws of the country, from the time of Cormac to the coming of St. Patrick and the compiling of the Seanchas Mór.

LECTURE II.

(Delivered 28th May, 1857.)

- (I.) LEGISLATION; (continued).—Of the existence of a regular System of Laws in Erin before the time of St. Patrick. Of the revision of the Laws, temp. St. Patrick. The Law of Adamnan. Of the Seanchas Mór: Criminal Law Code; Law of Contracts; Law of Ranks in Society; Military Laws; Laws as to the Land; various Special Laws. Law of Eric (or composition for murder) introduced with Christianity. Of the mode of Legislation, in the passing of new laws. Of the Meill Bretha, (temp. Conn). Of local Legislation by the several Tribes. Mode of making the Nos Tuaithe, or Local Law. Of the Twelve Books of Laws of West Munster (A.D. 690). Of some Laws not passed in assembly;—e.g. the Cain Domhnaigh, or Law of Sunday.
- (II.) SYSTEM OF CLASSES OF SOCIETY. Of the division of Classes of society in ancient Erin. Of the Flaith, or noble. Of the Ceillé, or tenant. Of the Four Classes of Bo-Airech. Of the Seven Classes of Flaith. Of the Fair of Carmán (Wexford); ancient accounts of the Legislative Assembly of the Kingdom of Leinster held there.

In my last lecture I opened the subject of the ancient civilization of Erin, so far as we can with certainty trace the evidences of it in the comparatively meagre annals existing concerning the very early eras of our national history. And as the growth of some System of Law, and its gradual progress to maturity, affords the best history of the civilization of every nation,—as it is also the most important of all the results of that civilization,—I applied myself in the first instance to this branch of the subject selected for the present course.

That some system of law—and by this I mean, not merely some body of separate enactments, but really a system—existed among the Milesian race, from a period contemporary with, if not anterior to, their original landing in the island, is perfectly plain from all their traditions and records. I have as yet only touched on the most important proofs of this fact, in pointing out to you the existence of a national Legislative Assembly, certainly some centuries, probably many, before the era of the great revision and completion of the Irish code in Saint Patrick's time. As this is the Code of which the greater part still remains to us, now happily destined to see the light under the direction of the Brehon Law Commission, I cannot pass over so shortly the history of its construction. Pending, however, the expected publication, it is not my intention, because it would not be proper for me, to enter at all into the details of these ancient Laws; full though they are of the most minute and the most

System of
Laws before St. Patrick's time.

interesting proofs of that civilization I have spoken of, in all the details of domestic as well as of political life. I proceed, then, to take up my narrative where we left off. LECT. II.

On the establishment of the Christian religion in Ireland by Saint Patrick, in the reign of Laeghairé MacNeill, it was found necessary to modify many of the ancient Pagan enactments, particularly in the criminal code, in order to bring them into closer harmony with the milder spirit of the Christian dispensation. To this end the monarch Laeghairé (according to the preface to the Seanchas Mór), on his conversion, convoked the national assembly to the Feast of Teamar; and after sufficient consideration it was decided that the whole of the ancient code should be submitted and explained to Saint Patrick, in order that he might point out such parts of it as it would be desirable to expunge. Revision of the Laws,
temp. St.
Patrick.

It will be observed that this statement implies, of course, the previous existence of a complete Code of Laws; and the convocation of the assembly of Tara to revise and republish the laws gives confirmation to the account quoted by Keting of the legislative powers of that assembly in earlier times.

For this purpose, the three most distinguished ollamhs (or doctors) in Poetry, Literature, and Law, then attached to the court of Teamar, were selected, namely, Dubhthach, the ollamh of poetry and written history (the first convert in Teamar); Ros MacTrichim, ollamh of the Berla Feiné, or technical law; and Fergus, ollamh in poetry. These three having made a general arrangement of the laws, and Dubhthach having explained them to Patrick, the saint then proceeded to mark out everything that was repugnant in them to the teaching of the Gospel. Having done this, the assembly proceeded to appoint what may be called, in modern language, a Committee of nine, to carry out fully the new revision. This committee consisted of three kings, three learned ollamhs, and three Christian bishops. The three kings were—Laeghairé, the monarch; Dairé, King of Ulster (or Oriell); and Corc, King of Munster. The three ollamhs were the above three learned men—Dubhthach, Ros, and Fergus. The three bishops were—Patrick, Benen, and Cairnech.<sup>(12)</sup> These authorities seem, however, to have only had power to consider and recommend the necessary changes.

The next step recorded proves that the supreme legislative power rested only with the whole body of the assembly convoked to the Feast. For we find that, after the revision of the laws had been completed by the personages just mentioned, the

<sup>(12)</sup> Leabhar na h-Uidhré, [R.I.A.] fol. 76, b.

LECT. II.

The Law of Adamnan.

purified code was next laid before the National Assembly, and received its formal assent; and thus it was that the revised Code became the law of the land, preserved under the distinctive name of the Seanchas Mór, or Great Body of Laws; a name which it received, I should tell you, not from the magnitude of the work, but from the greatness in number and nobility of the assembly that passed it. And it was under this great body of laws that this country continued chiefly to be governed, under native judges, from the year 439, in which it was revised, down to the year 1600, when it practically ceased to exist in my native county of Clare; the last, I believe, in Ireland, that retained it. It was at this time of Saint Patrick, too, of course, that the ecclesiastical element entered into our native legislation; but, as Teamar ceased to be the seat of government in the year 558, and as no one particular locality was ever after chosen for the monarch's residence, the long-revered Feast of Teamar ceased thenceforward to be held, as far as I have been able to ascertain, excepting in one single instance; and that was when Saint Adamnan procured the convocation of the states of the nation there, in the reign of the monarch Loingsech, between the years 694 and 701, for the purpose of enacting a special law to prohibit the presence of women in battle.

A copy of the curious law-tract containing this law, made by Father Michael O'Clery from the ancient Book of Rath Boith [Raphoe], in Donegall,—(a church founded by Saint Adamnan himself),—has been lately recovered, I think I may say through my own perseverance, by the Brehon Law Commission; and of this I have made a transcript and translation, which will appear along with the other parts of the ancient Institutes of Erin in the forthcoming publication under the direction of the commissioners. I may add, as an interesting feature of this curious tract, that it contains the names of all the personages, lay and ecclesiastical, who were present at the passing of the law, and who gave it their assent.

THE SEANCHAS MÓR.

Of the detailed contents of the laws passed by Laeghairé, I am not at liberty, as I have already observed, to give any account at present, even could the limits of these lectures allow of it. But, as a proof of that civilization of which it appears to me that the existence of a matured system of law is the greatest test and consequence, I shall only say, that when this Seanchas Mór shall be brought out by the Brehon Law Commission, it will be found to contain all the details of a general legal system.

Criminal Law.

It includes, in the first place, a System of Criminal Law, in which crimes of every sort are defined, and under which each has its special punishment; by which judges and officers are empowered by the state to inquire into all crimes and accusations; and under which legal punishments are enforced in every case of crime proved, by the power and authority of the state. I should observe that our ancient Criminal Law, as it now stands, dates from a period much older than the time of Lae-ghaire and Saint Patrick; for this very criminal code, or the greater part of it, is clearly laid down in the Book of Acaill, a legal tract compiled by the monarch Cormac Mac Airt, one hundred and seventy-four years before the compilation of the Seanchas Mór. LECT. II.

THE SEANCHAS MÓR.

In the second place, the Seanchas Mór contains a System of Law respecting Contracts, in which every species of Contract, bargain, or engagement is defined, and the competency or incompetency, and the rights and duties, of the contracting parties made clear; by which a penalty is incurred for the non-performance of every separate kind of contract; false and fraudulent contracts annulled, and fraud punished; and under which judges and officers are provided to decide all disputes concerning contracts, the decisions of such judges being in all cases enforced by the power and authority of the state. It is curious to remark that, under this ancient system, neither the judge nor the advocate,—of the latter of whom there were, it appears, three grades or classes,—was held harmless in cases of false or corrupt judgments, or faulty or incompetent advocacy. Law of Contracts.

It included, thirdly, the definition of a very nice and somewhat complicated System of Ranks of Society, from the king down; each rank or class having its own peculiar privileges, on the one side, while on the other the rights of the inferior classes are equally clearly defined and protected. Law of Ranks in Society.

In the fourth place, the laws included a Military System, for the Defence of the Country, and for the support of the powers and authority of the law and of the rulers throughout the island, according to the peculiar principles of the constitution under which the nation was governed. Military Laws.

Lastly, the Seanchas Mór settles the division of the whole island between the various tribes or families, and assures the right of every tribe and family to the possession of particular lands, and as to some particular tribes to particular privileges or immunities. Law as to the Land.

Among the most remarkable of these laws, both in point of principle and for the minute attention to all the details of circumstances which they display, I may particularly allude to: Various special Laws.

The laws defining all the different species of Bargains, Contracts, and Engagements between man and man.

The laws respecting Property entrusted or given in charge

LECT. II.
THE SEAN-
CHAS MOR.

by one man to another; and the Liability of the person trusted, in case of loss or damage, whether by accident or design.

The laws respecting Gifts and presents, and respecting Alms and Endowments.

The laws as to Waifs and Strays, Derelictions, and the Abandonment and Resumption of Property.

The law of Loans, Pledges, Accommodations, and Securities.

The law of Prescription, of Lapse, and of the Recovery of Possession of Property.

The laws concerning the relation of Father and Son, and the legal and illegal contracts of the son as connected therewith.

The laws respecting Illegitimate Children; and as to Affiliations, and the Adoption of children.

Laws minutely regulating the Fees of Doctors, Judges, Lawyers, and Teachers, and of all other professional persons.

A series of laws concerning the varied species of Industry; such as Weaving, Spinning, Sewing, Building, Brewing, etc.; concerning Mills and Weirs; concerning Fishing; concerning Bees, Poultry, etc., and so on; (full of most interesting details).

Laws with respect to Injuries to Cattle; by neglect, by over-driving, etc.

Laws concerning Fosterage, and the relative duties of Parents and Children, Foster-fathers and Foster-mothers; including details of a very curious kind, respecting the training, food, clothing, etc., of all foster-children, from the king to the peasant.

A very complicated, yet clearly defined series of laws upon Landlord and Tenant, and Master and Servant; explaining the different species of lords and of masters, of tenants and of servants; and the origin and termination of Tenantry and Service.

Laws concerning Trespass and Damage to Land, whether by man or beast.

A curious series of laws concerning Co-Occupancy of Land; and concerning the dividing, hedging, fencing, paling, ditching and walling, and the ploughing and stocking of land.

Laws of Evidence; of Corroborative Testimony; and of Compurgation.

The law of Distress and Caption; including most minute details, which appear to embrace almost every possible point that could be made concerning the legality or illegality of a Distress or Seizure.

The laws of Tithes and First Fruits; and concerning the relations of the Church with the state or nation (a law, doubtless, introduced at the direct suggestion of Saint Patrick).

Laws concerning the regulation of Churches and the tenants of Church lands, and the servitors of Churches and Ecclesiastical establishments.

LECT. II.

THE SEANCHAS MÓR.

In Criminal Law: complete laws respecting Manslaughter and Murder, distinguishing accurately between principals and accessories before and after the fact.

Laws concerning Thefts, and the receiving and recovery of stolen property; in the greatest possible detail.

* Laws concerning the infliction of Wounds and the shedding of Blood; and with regard to the commission of violence by insane as well as sane persons.

And, lastly, laws concerning Accidental Injuries; as from sledges, hammers, flails, hatchets, and other implements connected with peaceful labour.

In the preface to the Seanchas Mór we find it stated that before Saint Patrick's coming over with the Christian faith, there was no mercy or composition in cases of wilful murder, but death was paid with death, as under the ancient Hebrew law. He, however, in the spirit of the new Gospel, introduced the law of Composition, or Eric, in mercy to the criminal; by which law the life of the homicide was saved, should the aggrieved parties consent to accept the Eric, and that he or his friends were able to pay it. If they were not, however, he should die; but it seldom happened that he was not redeemed, by either friends or neighbours; (sometimes by an individual; in which latter case he became the bondman of him who redeemed him, until such time as he should be able to redeem himself, or should receive voluntary manumission).

Law of Eric or composition, (for Murder, etc.), introduced by St. Patrick.

In cases of aggravated manslaughter, when a man could not pay the Eric, he was put into a boat and set adrift on the sea.

The similarity of the ancient Milesian to the Hebrew law is also observable in that of Contracts. For, according to the Seanchas Mór, a man who failed to fulfil his lawful contracts, or who was guilty of any fraud, if not able to pay the legal fine, was obliged to go into the service of the plaintiff or person whom he had wronged, until by the profit of his labour he should liquidate the debt and expiate the crime he had committed.

Law of Contracts like that of the Jews. (Service for debt.)

There are scarcely any particular records of the passing of any special laws at the national convocation or parliament of Tara. We know only that, so long as the palace of Tara continued to be the seat of the central government, laws continued to be made there, or the more ancient laws revised and added to, by the assembled magnates of Erin. The general revision in Saint Patrick's time matured and completed the whole body of law up to that generation: and the same code seems to have Accounts of the passing of particular laws.

LECT. II. been found sufficient (and reasonably, as its publication will soon abundantly demonstrate,) for the social and political wants of the people for many centuries afterwards. Some few instances there are, however, of special laws having been subsequently added to the code, such as that of Adamnan, (in the year 699), to which I have already alluded.

The codification (if I may call it so) under King Laeghairé, was of course the re-arrangement of a vast number of specific laws that must have been passed from time to time during previous generations. Of the passing of one of these laws (of itself indeed a system of law with respect to a certain class of subjects) long before the great revision of which I have spoken, a very curious hint is preserved to us in an allusion to the legislative meeting of Tara, which is contained in the following entry in a MS. in the British Museum [Egerton, 88].

Of the Meill Bretha
(temp. Conn.)

"The Meill Bretha ("Good Judgments"), written at Tara, in the time of Conn of the Hundred Battles, by Bodainn or Modan.

"The cause of making this book was a quarrel that happened in the middle of the plain of Bregia, on November Day, between two parties of the youths who were fostered at Tara, under the care of Fuaimnech, daughter of King Conn. For she extorted a promise from the kings and nobles of Tara not to enter on the solution of the law questions of Erin until reparation was made for her foster-children. And they submitted the case to Bodainn, the judge, who gave judgment, and drew up this scheme of law for the future government of juvenile sports".

Such is the short history of this law; but whether or not these are the laws provided for such cases, and to be found in our present collections, it is now impossible to say.

So much for the laws of Tara,—the laws regulating the entire people of ancient Erin.

Of local legislation
by the several Tribes.

But, though the general system of law (law of contracts, criminal law, etc., etc.) had need to be the same throughout the whole island, yet many local rules and laws must have been required to meet the exigencies of particular tribes, circumstanced with reference to property or otherwise in some peculiar manner. And so we find that, according to the ancient constitution, every tribe or territory under the government of a Rígh, or king, could make local laws for itself, binding only, of course, within the territory. Such laws were necessarily supplemental only to the general law of the whole nation; and they were, in fact, framed solely with a view to the special circumstances and peculiar wants of the tribe. With respect to these local laws, we find an interesting entry explaining exactly the manner in which they could be passed. And in an extract which I shall also presently refer to, it will be seen that in addition to the labours of a Committee (such as that by which the Seanchas Mór was revised), a public general assembly of the tribe seems to have been necessary to give the required sanction to these local laws also.

It is stated in the MS. H. 3. 18, T.C.D., that the Nos Mode of making the Nos Tuathé, or Local Law. Tuathé, or Local Law, was made by a committee of nine persons; and, moreover, that no one could abolish it until they all resolved to do so without a dissentient voice,—for if there was even one of the nine disposed to retain it, it could not be abolished.

“If the people made an illegal custom, however”, says this authority, “they may with safety abolish it”;—that is, of course, illegal in the sense of being contrary to the general law of the whole island.

The nine persons who were required to make a lawful local custom were—a King, a Poet, a Brughaidh (a certain rank of farmer), a Bishop, a Teacher or Professor of literature, a Judge, an Advocate, an Airé Forgaill (an official answering to a sheriff), and an Airchinnech (or lay vicar).

The instance to which I have alluded, of the passing of one of these local laws (in that case, indeed, a code or body of laws for the tribe or territory) is as follows: The committee of nine appear to have been dispensed with, in veneration of a jurist of singular reputation, whose skill and learning seem to have been considered so great that the people consented to accept him as their lawgiver, though subject to the assent of a general convention or assembly of the tribe. The account in question is preserved in the MS. H. 3. 18, in the Dublin University Library. It is that of the compilation of Twelve Books of laws for West Munster, by Amargin, son of Amalgaidh, son of Maelruan, a native of the Decies (a district which included the modern county of Waterford, together with parts of Tipperary), in the time of Finginé, King of Munster, who died in 694. The Twelve Books of Laws for West Munster (by Amargin, son of Amalgaidh), circa A.D. 690.

Amargin was a distinguished scholar and poet, and the men of West Munster pressed him to go and learn for them the Feinechas, or national law. To this he consented, but on condition that when he had finished his studies and compiled a code of laws, the men of Munster should assemble in one plain and adopt them. Amargin returned in due time with twelve books of laws, of his own compilation; and the men of Mun-

LXCT. II. ster, under their king, at once proceeded to select a plain extensive enough for their multitudes to assemble in, and convenient enough for fish, fowl, water, venison, etc., during their assemblage. This plain they found between the Lake of Killarney and the Mangerton mountain. The land, however, being the inheritance of a local chief, named Cormac, he refused to grant the use of it on any other condition than that of having the body of laws ratified there named after himself and the land. To this the assembly were accordingly obliged to assent; and the compilation has ever since been known not only as Cain Fuithrimé, that is, the Law of Fuithrimé, (that being the name of the plain), but by the name of the Cain Chormaic, or Cormac's Law; and also by that of the Da Leabhar deag na Fuithrimé, that is, the Twelve Books of Fuithrimé.

Edward O'Reilly, in his "Irish Writers", at the year 696, calls this a law tract on the privileges and punishments of persons in different ranks in society. I am sorry to be obliged to say that I fear O'Reilly had no authority for this very loose description, as, unfortunately, not a page remains that can be recognized with certainty as any part of the Twelve Books of Fuithrimé.

The Rev. John Lynch (better known as "Gratianus Lucius") gives, in his "Cambrensis Eversus", a list—unauthorized and defective indeed—of ancient law tracts, among which he places the Cain Fuithrimé; but he ascribes its compilation to the time of Cathal, son of Finginné, King of Munster, who died in 737.

Of the Laws or Ordinances not passed in Assembly.

Before I leave the immediate subject of Legislation, I may observe that several rules or laws are to be found in our records, which were not passed at any such assemblies as those to which I have alluded. These laws or rules are generally quoted in connection with the names of the persons by whom they were introduced; and they could only have come into force, of course, by having been accepted, whether formally or not is another question, by the princes or tribes amongst whom they are recorded to have been put in force. Of this class of law or rule I shall just give you one example, interesting chiefly because it illustrates the strictness of thought which characterized the early ages of Christianity in Erinn.

There is a law tract or rule extant, entitled Cain Domhnaigh, or Law of Sunday, but the precise time at which it was promulgated is not exactly known; neither was it a law enacted by the states of Erinn, nor by any section of them, but simply a rule brought over from Rome for the observance of Sunday as a day totally free from labour, with certain unavoidable exceptions. The prohibitions of this law, and the fines for its transgression, would in our days be felt exceedingly severe. For example, "No out or in-door labour, not even sweeping or cleaning up the house; no combing; no shaving; no clipping the hair or beard; no washing the face or hands; no cutting; no sewing; no churning; no riding on horseback; no fishing; no sailing or rowing; no journeying of travellers,—but wherever a man happened to be on Saturday night, there was he to remain till Monday morning", etc. This Rule was brought over from Rome by Saint Conall, the son of Caelain, founder of the ancient church of Inis Cail; (now the island of Iniskeel, near the mouth of the Gweebarra bay, in the barony of Boyleagh, and county of Donegal).

I have not been able to ascertain the precise date of Saint Conall's death, but it must be anterior to the year 594, as Dallan Forgaill the poet was killed on this island, in or about that year, and buried at Saint Conall's church, according to the ancient preface to that poet's celebrated Elegy on Saint Colum Cille. There is, however, good reason to think that the rule was not promulgated until more than a century after Saint Conall's death.

There are imperfect copies of this most curious tract preserved in the Leabhar Mór Duna Doighré (commonly called the Leabhar Breac) in the Royal Irish Academy, and in the "Yellow Book of Lecain", (classed H. 2. 16, in Trinity College Library); and a perfect copy in MS., Egerton, 5280, in the British Museum.

With this short account, or rather with these few observations, upon the Legislation of ancient Erin, I pass now from this subject to another, which is, however, very nearly allied to it, that, namely, of the SYSTEM OF CLASSES into which society was divided in those early ages. The contents of the Seanchas Mór will, when published, prove abundantly sufficient (as will I am sure be at once acknowledged) to substantiate all that I can say respecting the very early civilization which distinguished this country of ours among the nations of Western Europe. And if I could with propriety make use of the materials in the study of which I have been engaged for the Brehon Law Commission, I should be able to occupy far more space than the whole of the present course can extend to in profitable description of the state of society which those materials abundantly disclose. This portion of our inquiries must, however, be postponed for the present; and as even that division of the general subject

LECT. II. just alluded to is itself also closely bound up with the laws which the labours of the commission are to illustrate, I must take leave to content myself, just now, with a very short statement of the nature and division of the various classes of which ancient Irish society was constituted. Some short description of them is essential to our being able to take even the most general view of the state of society in the early ages of our history; but, tempting as the subject is, I must nevertheless dismiss it here with a very few words indeed.

Rank in society in ancient Erinn, as in almost every other part of the world, depended upon the quantity of a man's property (particularly in land), and the nature of his ownership of it.

It is not very easy to translate into modern language the technical terms of the ancient laws of Landlord and Tenant; but a very well-matured system existed, at a very early period indeed, under which, although there was no such thing as absolute property in land in any individual, independent of his tribe, still, within the tribe, individuals held exclusive property in land, and entered into relations with tenants for the use of the land, and these again with under-tenants, and so on, much as we see it in our own days. Now these relations constitute the first test of rank or condition. The Flaith,—a word which in some sense may be translated the Lord, or Nobleman,—was distinguished by being the absolute owner (within his tribe) of land for which he paid no rent; so that, if a man possessed but a single acre in this way, he was a Flaith. All other persons holding land held it either from a Flaith or from some tenant of his; and the rank and precedence of these persons depended upon the amount of their possessions. Tenancy (Ceilsiné) again, was of two kinds. One may call the two classes of Céilé or tenant, Free Céilés and Bond Céilés, for want of better names in English. The Bond Céilé was, however, by no means a slave, though he was bound to assist or follow his landlord in war-time; he was merely a tenant, paying a higher rent (in kind) than the other. The true distinction was simply this:—the Free Céilé took the land which he stocked himself, and paid for it a rent in kind, the value of the occupation or use of the land;—the Bond Céilé took land without stock, and his landlord stocked it for him; so that he paid a greater rent in kind, as he paid for the use of the stock as well as the land; and at the end of his term of tenancy (which was generally for seven years), he had to give up not only the land, but also stock of the same number, kind, and value as had been originally supplied to him, if required. This distinction of tenancies applied to

The Flaith, or Landowner.

The Céilé, or Tenant.

all tenancies, however large the quantity of land taken, and however rich the tenant.<sup>(13)</sup>

LECT. II.
I. THE TEN-
ANT CLASS.

In distinguishing the classes of society who enjoyed legal honours or privileges, we may, of course, pass over that large majority of the people who then as now occupied the honourable but humble position of tenants of very small holdings; and equally with them the labouring class, servants and bondmen. In so general a view as that to which I must confine myself, I shall only speak of those classes already high enough to hold a certain social rank, and to be entitled to a certain fixed precedence.

In a fragment of the Crith Gabhlach,—of which I have for many years possessed a copy,—the scale of rank, beginning from below, commences with the degree of Bo Aireach, or Gentleman Cow-owner. Of these there were several classes; but all Bo Aireachs were tenants, paying rent in kind for all the land they held. They were distinguished by the quantity of property they had; and were bound to have always at least a certain quantity of property, houses, etc., in order to continue entitled to the rank and privileges appointed them by law.

I. The Bo Aireach.

The lowest of the Bo Aireach was the Bo Aireach Febhsa. He had land of seven Cumhal; [a Cumhal was three cows and land of seven Cumhal meant land sufficient for the grazing of three times seven, or twenty-one, cows.] He should have a sleeping-house and an eating house of certain dimensions, being liable to receive visits from strangers and others privileged by law to be entertained for a certain time. He had a certain share in the mill of the district; and he had of his own a kiln, a barn, etc. Certain fees also were payable to him for the exercise of certain legal privileges, such as that of being legal witness to a contract, and so on.

I. 1.—The Bo Aireach Febhsa.

The next rank of Bo Aireach was the Bruighfer; who was distinguished by the extent of his farm, which should consist of twenty-one Cumhal; (that is, enough to graze sixty-three cows). And, as being what would now be called in Munster a "strong farmer", he was to set an example to his neighbours; for it was part of his duty to instruct the people by the arrangements of his house and establishment; and a list is given of all the various household and farm utensils and conveniences which he was bound "to have always, without borrowing". He was also bound by law to have always a stock of certain specified provisions, "to sustain the visit of a king, or bishop, or poet, or judge, from the road". His property is fixed at much

I. 2.—The Bruighfer.

<sup>(13)</sup> [It is worthy of remark that a very similar system of tenancy exists in France, under the Code Napoléon.]

LECT. II.

[I. THE TEN-
ANT CLASS.]

higher than the Bo Aireach Febhsa, and his fees are in proportion. All trespass upon his house or stock was punished by severe fines, prescribed for every case; and there is a curious list of irregularities, injuries, and offences which might be committed by such visitors as those just alluded to, or their attendants, while sojourning at his house, and which should be paid for according to a fixed scale of fines or compensation. The Bruighfer was already on the way to hereditary nobility; for the law required that he should have for wife "only the daughter of an equal, and one who had never been married before".

I. 3.—The
Fer Fothla, or An-Flaith.

The next rank of Bo Aireach was the Fer Fothla, or leader of Bo Aireach; who was wealthier than the Bruighfer, for he had a greater quantity of cattle than he could support on his own land, and so let them to other persons, who became his tenants or vassals (if that be an appropriate word) in return for the stock they hired from him. One remarkable privilege appears to have been attached to this class of Bo Aireach; namely, that although an Aithech or tenant, he became a Flaith or noble, from being a tenant, in the progress of his grazing, whenever he should have amassed property to the amount of double that which marked the lowest order of nobility among the Flaith, namely, the Airé Desa, of whom I shall presently speak. This Fer Fothla was called an An-Flaith, and was in fact a sort of rich middleman. He was, however, only entitled to one-half the amount of compensation which a full Flaith might claim, for property injured, or insult or injury to his person.

I. 4.—The Airé Coisring, (the Airé Finé).

The highest rank of Bo Aireach was the Airé Coisring; one who bound (that is, entered into engagements with) the king and people on behalf of the particular tribe, name, or family to which he belonged, they having consented to grant him the leadership and power to speak for them. This Representative Bo Aireach was the Airé Finé, or family chief, who answered to the king or chief for the obedience of his tribe to the law. But any complete account of the nature of his rank would lead me too far into the details of his functions, and the peculiar system of law of which they formed a part.

The same law which defined the different degrees of Bo Aireach, and appointed to each its rank and privileges, prescribed, too, the punishment of degradation for any breach of the Bo Aireach's official duties. The list of the misdeeds by which this officer became degraded, and the mode by which he was permitted to make amends before the people, and so to recover his honour, are very interesting, and throw a great light indeed upon the spirit of the times in which they were prescribed by a national law. LECT. II.

According to the same fragment, the order of Flaith comprised Seven Degrees of Nobility. The Airé Désa; the Airé Echtai; the Airé Ard; the Airé Túisi; the Airé Forgaill; the Tanaisé Rígh (or tanist of the king); and the Rígh, (or king). The Deis was his Estate, and the right to protect his privileges; and the privileges of the Flaith were those of the ancient Protection of the people of his territory, the exercise of his Office under the law within the territory, and that of Leader or Tanist Leader, in war; and to have Serving Vassals and Free Vassals, and Sén Cleithe (a class of tenants distinguished, and having legal rights and responsibilities, as having been upon the land for three generations, either as tenants or as squatters, undisturbed). And the nobility of the Flaith was in these Estates and Privileges. II. THE LANDLORD CLASS.
Seven degrees of Flaith.

The Airé Désa was so called, as distinguished from the Bo Airé, because he was paid Diré (duty, rent, value), on account of his Deis, and not for his cows (bo), like the other. He had Ten Céilés, or tenants; five free and five bond-Céilés;—and from each of these he was entitled to fixed annual supplies of food and cattle, as rent and tribute. Certain houses and property were prescribed by law in the case of the Airé Désa, as necessary to his rank; just as in the different orders of Bo Aireach;—and besides these he should have certain state equipments, (such as a riding-steed with a silver bridle); and he wore a precious stone brooch, worth an unga, [about ten shillings]. His wife should be “a lawful wife in first marriage”, of equal rank with himself, and equally richly dressed. But his rank and precedence among the Flaith were according to his deeds: according to what he had done to deserve honour. The Airé guarded at law the rights of tenants among one another, and saw the law carried out between them. II. 1.—The Airé Désa.

The Airé Echtai was an Airé, or chief, of five men equipped for war; with whom he was in time of peace to avenge and punish all insults, and particularly violence by murder, done to his tribe. II. 2.—The Airé Echtai.

The Airé Ard (or High Airé) preceded the Airé Désa. He had twenty Céilés;—ten bond, and ten free. His various possessions were greater in proportion. II. 3.—The Airé Ard.

The Airé Túisi (or Leading Airé) took precedence over all the former, by being of superior race or family. He had twenty-seven Céilés, of whom fifteen were bond-Céilés. His wealth and privileges were proportionately greater; but whatever the wealth of an Airé, it was family alone that could give II. 4.—The Airé Túisi.

LECT. II.

[II. THE LANDLORD CLASS.]II. 5.—The Airé For-
guill.

him this rank. He wore a golden bridle on his riding-steed, as well as a silver one.

The Airé Forgaill was so called because "fortgell",—he testified,—to the character of the other Flaiths in court. The duties and legal privileges of this high functionary would also require, for proper description, a much more detailed examination of the laws than I can make here. The Airé Forgaill was richer than the preceding orders. He had forty Céilés;—twenty bond and twenty free. His property in land and stock was very extensive; his houses large and richly appointed; and his following powerful.

II. 6.—The Tanaisé
Righ (Tanist of a King).

The Tanaisé Righ, (or Tanist of a King,) was next in rank, standing only second to the king himself. He was so called "because" (as the fragment already referred to explains it) "the whole territory" (or people) "adhere to him without opposition". He had five Sen Cléithé more than the Airé Forgaill, and was always attended by ten men. In all the other points as to wealth, etc., the Tanaisé Righ stood far higher than the other nobles.

II. 7.—The
Righ, (King).

Next comes the Righ (or King); but it is not necessary for me to say anything of him here.

I have now concluded what I had to say upon the general system of Legislation and Law, and the division or distinction of Classes in ancient Erinn. It is to be remembered that I introduced the subject only as so inseparably and importantly connected with the history of our ancient civilization, that it could not be omitted altogether: and I think I have said enough to lead to an expectation from the forthcoming publication of the Laws of the most conclusive proofs of a civilization long denied by our enemies in modern literature, and doubted by our own writers.

Account of the Fair of Carmán;
(A.D. 718-1023).

When speaking of the convocation of Tara,—the Fair or Feast of Tara, anciently held every three years,—I had at first intended to illustrate the account of it preserved by Keting, by reference to a very ancient poem upon a similar assembly, held as anciently for the province of Leinster, but which continued to be celebrated long after the abandonment of the ancient centre of government of all Erinn. I allude to the Fair of Carmán (now Wexford), which was revived, A.D. 718, by Dunchadh, King of Leinster, and last celebrated in A.D. 1023, by Donagh Mac Gillpatrick. There is preserved in the Book of Leinster (a MS. known to have been compiled about the year 1150), a great part of a celebrated old poem upon this fair; which I believe to have been contemporary with the last celebration of the feast, if not of even a more ancient date. And, on reflection, this poem seems to me to be of so much importance to the general scope of the present course, that I have preferred to reserve it for the conclusion of this lecture, in order that I may give it in full. For though the allusion it contains to the legislative action of these assemblies is confined to a single verse, there is a vast quantity of important historical matter in the whole of it, to which I shall have frequent occasion to refer.

LECT. II.
[Account of the Fair of Carmán;
(A.D. 718-1029).]

The tract in the Book of Leinster is unfortunately not all legible; but about a third part of it is legible. It will therefore be more convenient if I precede my reading of the fragment of it still decipherable, by the account or version of the same piece which is preserved in the Book of Ballymote.

The latter is, literally translated, as follows:

“Three men who came from Athens, and one woman; these were the three sons of Dibad, son of Dorcha, son of Ainches; Dian, Dubh, and Dothur, were their names; and Carmén was the name of their mother.

“The mother, wherever she went, blasted and blighted everything by spells, charms, and incantations; and it was by magical devastation and dishonesty that the men dealt out destruction.

“They came into Erin to bring evil upon the Tuatha Dé Danann, by blighting the fertility of the country against them.

“The Tuatha Dé Danann were incensed at this; and they sent against them Ai, the son of Ollamh, on the part of their Poets; and Cridenbel on the part of their Satirists; and Lug Laeban, the son of Caicher, on the part of their Druids; and Becuillé on the part of their Witches, to pronounce incantations and satires against them; and they never parted from them until they forced the three men over the sea, leaving behind them their mother Carmén as a pledge that they should never again return to Erin; and they also swore, by the divinities which they adored, that they would not return as long as the sea flowed around Erin.

“Their mother, however, soon died of grief of her hostage-ship; and she requested of the Tuatha Dé Danann that they would institute a fair and games in her honour wherever she should be buried, and that the fair and the place should receive and retain her name for ever; and hence Carmán, and the Fair of Carmén. And the Tuatha Dé Danann observed this Fair as long as they occupied Erin.”

“Another version is, that old Garmán had followed the seven cows of Eochaidh Belbuidhé, King of Ceanntiré [Kintire

LECT. II.
[Account of the Fair of Carmán;
(A.D. 718-1023).]

or Cantire, in Scotland,] which cows had been carried off by Lena, the son of Mesroeda, whose mother was Uca, daughter of Osca, King of Certa, for she was the wife of Misroeda, son of Dathó, King of Leinster; [about the time of the Incarnation].

"There were along with Lena, at driving these cows away, Sen, the son of Durb; and Lochar the Swift, son of Smirach; and Gunnat, the son of Succat; and Altach, the son of Dalbh; and Mothur, the son of Lorgach.

"Old Garmán discovered them at the south side of Dathó's Dun; and he killed Lena, with his women and the men who assisted him to carry off the cows. And old Garmán then carried away his kine to Magh Misca [that is, Mesca's Plain, where Wexford now stands]; and she, Mesca, was the daughter of the great chieftain Bodhbh, of the hill of Finnchaidh, in the mountain Monach, in Scotland; who had been carried off by him (old Garmán), in a trance; and Mesca died of shame in this place; and her grave was made there, namely, the grave of Mesca, daughter of Bodhbh.

"And the four sons of King Dathó overtook old Garmán at this place, namely, Mes Seda, and Misroeda, and Mesdeda, and Mesdelmon; and old Garmán fell by them there; and they made his grave there; and so he begged of them to institute a Fair (or games of commemoration) for him there, and that the fair and the place should bear his name for ever: and hence the Fair of Carmán, and old Carmán have their names".

"And the people of Leinster observed this fair in tribes and families, down to the time of the monarch Cathair Mór; [in the second century]. Cathair left the privileges of Carmán but to his own sons and their families, giving precedence to the race of his son Rossa Fuilghé, their dependent branches, and their exiles, to keep the fair in perpetuity; namely, the Leinstermen proper, and the Fotharts"; [the present baronies of Forth].

"There were seven days for sport, or racing, there; and a week for considering and proclaiming the privileges and laws of the province for the three years to come.

"It was on the last day that the Leinstermen south of Gabhar, [the men of Ossory], held their fair or racing; and hence it was called the steed-contest of the Ossorians. The seat of their king was on the right hand of the King of Carmán or Leinster; and the seat of the King of O'Fuilghé [Offaly], on his left; and it was the same case with their wives.

"It was on the Kalends of August they assembled at it; and it was on the 6th of August they left it; and it was every third year it was held; and the preparations were going on for two years. LECT. II.

"It was five hundred and eighty years since the first fair was held there, to the fortieth year of the reign of Octavius Augustus, in which Christ was born. [Account of the Fair of Carmán; (A.D. 718-1023).]

"The Leinstermen were promised abundance of corn and milk for holding it, and that no other province should control them; and that they should enjoy righteous laws, and comfort in every house, and fruit in great abundance, and their harbours, lakes, and rivers teem with water (and fish). And if they did not observe it, that failure and early grayness should fall upon themselves and their kings".

Then comes the same, but much expanded, in verse, as follows:

- "Listen, O Lagenians of the monuments,
 You host who never opposed justice,
 Until you hear from me, in all directions,
 The etymology of far-famed Carmán.
- "Carmán, the hill of a noble fair,
 With a wide-spread unobstructed green
 For the hosts who repaired there to occupy it,
 On which they contested their noble races.
- "It is the cemetery of noble, valiant kings,
 The dearly-loved of admiring hosts;
 There are many, under the meeting mounds,
 Of their ever-loved departed ancestors.
- "To mourn for queens and kings,
 To sing forth great valour and great deeds;
 Often did the fair hosts of autumn assemble
 Upon the smooth cheek of noble old Carmán.
- "Was it a man, or was it men, of great valour,—
 Or was it a woman of violent jealousy,—
 That gave name, not contemptible, pleasing,
 That gave its true name to lovely Carmán?
- "It was not men, and it was not angry man,
 But a single woman, fierce and vengeful,
 Loud her rustling and her tramp,
 From whom Carmán received its first name.
- "Carmén, the wife of great Dibad's son.
 The son of Dorcha, of armies and hospitality,
 Son of Ainceas, of abounding prosperity,
 Who commanded armies in many battles.
- "No pursuit of profit could they pursue,
 For ardent love of noble Erin, "

LECT. II.

[Account of the Fair of Carmén;
(A.D. 718-1023).]

For they were at all times supine in the East,
The sons of Dibad, and their mother.

“ At length they westwards took their way,
Dian, and Dubh, and Dothur,
From delightful Athens in the East,
By their mother Carmén accompanied.

“ They worked against the Danaan race,
These newly-come malignant men,
Destruction to their lands’ produce:
It was a dreadful, unjust evil.

“ Carmén, by a wonderful series of spells
Consigned all milk and fruit to ruin,
By the unlawful arts pursued
By the sons, in their unjust warfare.

“ Soon the Tuath-Dé-Danaan perceived
What robbed the land and soil of bloom;
And for every evil by them wrought,
They hurled an equal deed upon them.

“ Crithenbel,—no silly personage,—
And Lug, the crooked-eyed son of Caicher,
And Becuilé, in every field attacked them,
And Ai, the son of Ollamh.

“ Death to ye (said the Dananns), we choose not nor desire,
We seek it not of our free choice;
Cheerfully, then, leave us a proper pledge,
And depart from Erin, each man of you three.

“ These men then from us departed,—
Their expulsion was achieved by mighty force;
Though it was a woman they left as pledge,—
Carmén, alive, in her narrow cell.

“ All their known oaths they gave as security,—
The sea, the fire, and the fair-faced earth,— That they would not come back, in power or in weakness,

As long as the sea encircled Erin.

“ Carmén, who caused death and battles,
Who once so worked her necromancy,
Received the fate which she deserved,
Among the oaks of these firm mounds.

“ Hither came to mourn her fate,
To lament her, and to bemoan,
The Tuath-Dé-Danann, upon the noble plain;
And this was the first proper fair of Carmán.

“ The mound of Carmán—by whom raised?
Ye have not found, ye do not know;

- According to our beloved forefathers,
It was by Breas, the son of Ealathan. Listen ye!
- "Four score and fair five hundred
Is what was spent, in truth, of years,
From Carmén of demoniac spells,
Altogether to the computed time of Jesus.
- "Two years, thirty, and four hundred,
From the birth of Christ—no small progress,—
To Crimhthann's reign over lovely Carmán,
To Patrick the great and glorious.
- "Five kings and thirty, without sorrow, here,
Of the Leinstermen, before the Faith of Christ,
Their pride over Erin had spread,
From thy sweet-sounding harbour, O Carmán!
- "Five kings that have governed to this,
Of the champions of Christianity,
The competent country of the wounds,
Down to the upright Diarmaid of Duirgén.
- "The Leinstermen continued to hold this fair,
By their tribes, and by their families,
From Labraidh Loingsech—theme of poets—
To powerful Cathair of red spears.
- "Cathair bequeathed Carmán
But to his own great and powerful sons;
And as the head of these, in ample wealth,
The race of Rossa Failghé held it.
- "The seat of the king of noble Airget-Ros [Ossory].
On the right hand of the noble king of Carmán;
On his left, for every happy enjoyment,
The seat of the smooth-speared king of Cruachan, (i. e.
Cruachan Claenta.) [Offaly].
- "And behind him the numerous race of Lugaidh;
Laigneich of the large head, son of Conall;
And the Fotharta, rich in jewels;—
No want of wealth with both these guardians.
- "In the Kalends of August, without fail,
They assembled in every third year;
They arranged seven well-fought races,
In the seven days of the week.
- "Here they proclaimed in flowery words,
The Privileges and Laws of the Province;
Every rule of over severe law,
In every third year they adjusted.
- "Corn, milk, peace, ease, prosperity,
Waters full in all abundance,

LECT. II.

[Account of the Fair of Carman;
(A.D. 718-1023).]

Righteous rules, and loyalty to kings,

With troops to coerce [i. e. to rule over] Erinn, (were its rewards).

"The hospitality of the Hy-Drona,
And the steed-contests of the men of Ossory,
And the clash of spear handles
From the entire host, was its termination.

"There comes of its not being holden,
Baldness, cowardice, early grayness,
With other numerous disasters,
To the noble Leinstermen. Listen!

"Though we had called it Mesca's Mound,
It should not be in mockery or in enmity,
Who, with old crooked Garmán, her husband,
Here was buried in far ancient time.

"Even though [we admit that] from these it were named,
Among the etymological writings,
It were due, without doubt, and were right,
O Leinstermen of the monuments. Listen!

This fine version is from the Book of Ballymote. The following is (so far as can be deciphered) a translation of what is preserved in the still earlier Book of Leinster:

"The Leinstermen held this, the fair,
Both as tribes and as householders,
From Labraidh Loingsech of the shining hosts,
To the powerful, red-speared Cathair.

"Cathair bequeathed not Carman
But unto his great and mighty sons;
At the head of whom—with varied wealth,
Are the race of Rossa Failghé,—as you see.

"The throne of the King of noble Argat-Ros, Stood at the right of the powerful King of Carman;
On his left hand, in his hereditary place,
The throne of the King of the plain-woody Gaibhlé.

"Following these were the great race of Lugaidh
Laighsech, the son of the powerful Conall;
And the Fotharts who knew no thirst,
In no paucity of splendour behind these.

"On the Kalends of August, without fail,
They repair thither every third year;
Here they proclaim boldly and loudly
The privileges of every law, and their restraints.

"To sue, to levy, to controvert debts.
To abuse steeds in their career

- Is not allowed here by contending racers; [nor] Elopement, oppression, or arrest.
- “ No man goes into the women’s assembly,
No women into the assembly of fair clean men;
No abduction here is heard of,
Nor repudiation of husbands nor of wives.
- “ Whoever transgresses the Law of the Kings,
Which Benen so accurately and permanently wrote,<sup>(14)</sup>
Cannot be spared upon family composition,
But he must die for his transgression.
- “ Here follow its great privileges [i. e. the splendid sights and enjoyments of the fair].
Trumpets, harps, wide-mouthed horns;
Cusighs, timpanists, without fail;
Poets, and groups of agile jugglers:
- “ Finian Tales,—Finian’s career, without limit;
Destructions of courts,<sup>(15)</sup> Cattle-Spoils, Courtships;
Inscribed tablets, books of ‘trees’ [ogham];
Satires, and sharp-edged philippics.
- “ Proverbs, Maxims, royal Precepts;
And the truthful Instructions of Fithal;
Occult poetry, topographical Etymologies;
The Precepts of Carbré and of Cormac.
- “ The Feasts, with the important Feast of Teamar; Fairs, with the great Fair of Emania;
Annals there verified too;
And all the divisions into which Erin was divided.
- “ The history of the Hill of mighty Teamar;
The knowledge of every Territory in Erin;
The history of bands of noblest Women;
Courts; Enchantments; Conquests.

<sup>(14)</sup> This Law of Benen is the Leabhar na g-Ceart before mentioned—(published by the Celtic Society, Dublin, 1847.) [The Leabhar na g-Ceart (“Book of Rights”) contains a great portion of the law which in ancient Erin settled the relations between the several classes of society, and especially the relations between the local authorities and the Central and Provincial kings. “It gives”, (says the Introduction to the edition just referred to, p. vi.), “an account of the rights of the monarchs of all Ireland, and the revenues payable to them by the principal kings of the several provinces, and of the stipends paid by the monarchs to the inferior kings for their services. It also treats of the rights of each of the provincial kings, and the revenues payable to them from the inferior kings of the districts or tribes subsidiary to them, and of the stipends paid by the superior to the provincial kings for their services”,—(etc.). The admirable edition of this work by the Celtic Society was prepared by the late J. O’Donovan, with the assistance of Professor O’Curry; the valuable Introductions were the work of the late W. E. Hudson, who superintended the publication on the part of the Council of the Society.]

<sup>(15)</sup> See an account of these various classes of “Historic Tales”, in the Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; pp. 241, et seq.

LECT. II.

[Account of the Fair of Carmán;
(A.D. 718-1023) ]

- “ The noble Testament of Cathair the Great,
To his sons who excelled all wealthy kings;
Every one's inheritance, as he lawfully inherits,
That all of them should hear and know.
- “ Pipers, fiddlers, banded-men,
Bonemen, and fluteplayers;
The host of chattering bird-like flyers;
Shouters and loud bellowers.
- “ These all exert themselves to the utmost
For the impetuous King of the Barrow;
And the noble king by estimate bestows
Upon each profession its rightful honour.
- “ The history of Elopements, Conflagrations, musical Concerts;
The accurate Synchronisms of noble races;
The Succession of their gifted kings in Bregia [i.e. Temar];
Their battles and their hardy valour.<sup>(16)</sup>
- “ Such is the arrangement of the fair,
By the lively ever happy host;—
May they receive from the Lord,
A land teeming with choicest fruits.
- “ The saints of Leinster, on a certain day,
The saints of the alliance without guile,
Over the court of Carmán's bright lake,
Celebrate mass, genuflections, and psalms.
- “ They fast in the autumn—it is true—
At Carmán, all of them together,
For the people of Leinster, against a season of scarcity;
Against tyranny; against oppression.
- “ The clergy and laity of Leinster, together,
Are a compact body of worthy men;
God, who knows how well they merit,
To their noble prayers will listen.
- “ The hospitality of the Ui Drona next;
And the steed-battle of the Ossorians;
And the clash of the shafts of spears
From the hosts, then, is the end.
- “ Though we should call it the mound of Mesca,
It would not be in idleness nor in enmity;
It was old Garmán—true is the knowledge,—
That there was buried a long time ago.
- “ Though [we should admit] it was from him it was named,
Among the hosts who there were placed;
That name it deserved and was its due;—
O Leinstermen of the tombs, pray listen!

<sup>(16)</sup> This verse is evidently misplaced.

- " Twenty-one raths of lasting fame [there are],
In which hosts are laid [there] under ground;
A psalm-singing cemetery of high renown [there is]
By the side of beloved noble Carmán.
- " Seven mounds without touching each other,
For the oft lamenting of the dead:
Seven plains, sacred, without a house,
For the sports of joyous Carmán were reserved.
- " Three markets were held within its borders;
A market for food; a market for live cattle; [and]
The great market of the foreign Greeks,
In which are gold and noble clothes.
- " The slope of the steeds; the slope of the cooking;
The slope of the assembly of embroidering women.
No man of the happy host Receives adulation, receives reproach.
- " There comes of not celebrating this feast
Baldness, cowardice, early grayness;
A king without wisdom, without wealth,
Without hospitality, without truthfulness.
- " Hitherto they have been powerful and warlike,
The numerous hosts of Labhraidh's house;
Every host which is not aggressive is like a deer;
It is dared, but dares no one.
- " May I be welcomed by the saintly Host of Heaven,
And by the beautiful, all-perfect God;
The King of graceful Hosts may I reach,—
To all our prayers He will listen!—Listen!"

It would be out of place to enter into any criticism on these singularly interesting accounts of the Fair of Carmán, or even to point out (as I should wish to do) the particular importance and value of a vast number of allusions made in the poems. I have only translated them here for the sake of the light they throw on what was called the Fair of Tara; and because they show the nature of these Assemblies, and how the grave business of legislation was performed on appointed days, in the midst of others set apart for pleasure or reserved for mercantile pursuits.

LECTURE III.

[Delivered 2nd June, 1857.]

(III.) EDUCATION, AND LITERATURE. Of Education in Erin in the early ages. Schools of the Fileadh, or Poets. Account of some of the more distinguished men of learning in the early ages in Erin. Of the Historians of the Tuatha Dé Danann. Of the Historians and Poets of the Milesians. Of the ancient Genealogical Poem by Finn, father of Concobar Abhradh-Ruadh, (Monarch, B.C. 6.). Of Adhna, chief Poet of Concobar MacNessa. Of a very ancient Gaelic Grammar. Of literary offices connected with the Courts of the early monarchs. State of learning in the time of Concobar MacNessa. Of the "Pot of Avarice" of the Fileadh. List of eminent men of learning (continued). Poems of King Oilioll Olum. Poems of King Art "the Solitary". Foundation of a University by Cormac MacAirt, in the third century. Of the Book of O'Duvedan. Of the literary education of Finn Mac Cumhaill. Of Torna Eigeas; and of learning temp. Niall. Of the presence of King Cerc at Tara, at the time of the revision of the Seanchas Mór. Of the Succession of the Kings of Munster.

AFTER having dwelt so long on the Laws and Institutions of Ancient Erin, and on the Classes who were qualified to take part in enacting them, as well by right of social as of intellectual rank, it is now time to give some short account of the Literary Institutions, or other sources of Literary Instruction, at which those who drew their social position not from the possession of land or wealth, but from intellectual acquirements alone, learned to become qualified to sit in the courts of kings and nobles, and to take part in the national deliberations.

Of Literature and Education in Erin in the earlier ages.

It is much to be lamented that of distinct references to the character and extent of literary Education in this country, in remote times, but few comparatively have come down to us. As far, however, as we can collect from these few references, it would appear that, down to the introduction of Christianity, in the year of our Lord 432, the instruction of youth was entirely in the hands of two classes of men: the Fileadh, or Poets; and the Druids; but it very often happened that these two characters were united in the same person.

Of the Druids I shall have to give some account on another occasion, in a future Lecture.

Derivation of "Druid" and of "Fili" (Poet).

Some of our old glossarists explain the name Druid by "doctus", learned; and Fili, a poet, by "philo", "amator", a lover of learning.<sup>(17)</sup> But Cormac MacCullinan, in his Glossary, <sup>(17)</sup> See Note 2 (p. 2), and Appendix No. I. (p. 461), to Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History.

(one of the most reliable authorities we possess, and one of the earliest), derives the word Fili from Fí, poison, or venom, and Li, brightness, or beauty; meaning that the poet's satire was venomous, and his praise bright or beautiful.

The Poet (and the Druid), according to Seanchán, when attached to the court of a king or chief, had his pupils about him, and taught and lectured them wherever he found it convenient, often within doors, but often in the open air; and when he travelled through the territory, or from one territory to another, his pupils accompanied him, still receiving his instructions. When, however, they exceeded the number which he was entitled by law to have accommodated as his own company at a respectable house, the excess were almost always freely entertained by the neighbours in the locality. The chief poet appears to have been always accompanied by a number of assistants of various degrees, who had not yet arrived at the highest rank in their profession. Of these, with their several attainments, I gave some account in a former Lecture.<sup>(18)</sup>

Schools of the Fíleadh (Poets).

The Druid, in his simple character, does not appear to have been ambulatory, but stationary. He is not recognized in any of our existing ancient laws as entitled to any privileges or immunities such as the Poets, and Brehons or Judges, enjoyed; but he had his place at court, and ranked with a particular degree of the nobility in the Teach Midhechuarta, or Banqueting Hall, of Tara; and, like the Poet, he appears to have been accustomed to instruct his pupils in the open air as well as within doors. As the general subject of what is known concerning the Druids, however, will be treated of in a subsequent Lecture, I shall pass it over here, and confine myself for the present to the consideration of the means and extent of general Education in the country, in the earlier ages of our history, so far as the facts recorded in our various historical writings will enable me to deal with the subject.

The Druids.

It would be futile, at this distance of time, and considering the destruction and dispersion that for ages have befallen our ancient Books, to attempt to find or to give any close and detailed account of the exact state of Education in this country before the beginning of the Christian era, or, indeed, I might say, before the establishment of Christianity in it, in the fifth century. Almost all that can be done here is to recount a short list of the most eminent of those whose names have come down to us as distinguished in the several sciences of Law, of Poetry,

Account of some of the most distinguished men of learning in ancient Erin.

<sup>(18)</sup> See Lect. XI. of the Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, (p. 239, et seq.).

LECT. III.

(if indeed the Gaedhelic Fíledheacht is to be translated by this insufficient name<sup>(19)</sup>), and History. And in giving such account of these learned men as the materials we yet possess may allow, I shall in fact have furnished the most reliable sketch of our early civilization; because almost all of them are recorded as so distinguished in consequence of their having been themselves the teachers of those who came after them, while they are also examples of the cultivation of the respective ages in which they lived.

The earliest period at which I can begin to note any details of authorship and learning, so as to carry down the chain with some connection, is not more remote than the reign of the great monarch Ugaine Mór, who flourished (according to the Annals of the Four Masters) some six hundred years before the Christian era. There are, however, some records existing of the celebrity of many learned men, even before that distant age.

The following list of some of the persons who were believed to have preserved the ancient history of Erin, is found in the Book of Ballymote, a manuscript volume compiled, indeed, as has been already stated, so lately as in A.D. 1391, but from various very ancient Irish manuscripts now lost for ever. This list is not chronologically arranged, but I have thrown it into chronological order, as far as I have been able to identify the persons whose names are set down in it. The list is confined to the Tuatha Dé Danann and Milesian colonists, and preserves no names of the Firbolgs, Nemedians, and Partholans, who, according to our old writings, preceded them. It is a rather meagre yet an important catalogue, and looks like the skeleton of one of the early histories of Erin, commenced by some old author, but never finished. Indeed, in a notice at the end of the list, but which was intended to be placed at the head of the list of Milesian writers, the author says: "These are the historians of the Gaedhils, who formed the Historical Books, in Histories and in Annals".

The tract begins by stating that "ancient men preserved history from the beginning of the world"; and then follow the Irish Historians thus:

Daghda the great King of the Tuatha Dé Danann, about the year of the world 3304. The Mór Rígan, or great Queen, his wife. Etan the Poetess, daughter to Diancecht, the Tuath Dé Danann Physician, of the same period. Coirpré, the Poet, son of the Poetess Etan. Senbec the grandson of Ebric, of the same

The Historians of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

(19) See Note 2 (p. 2), and Appendix, No. I. (p. 461), to the former course of Lectures, already referred to.

period. Ogma (the inventor of the alphabet called Ogham), LECT. III.
son of Elathan, son of Delbaeth, of the same period.

These were the Historians of the Tuatha Dé Danann; and after these come, (of the Milesians): Amergin, one of the Milesian Brothers, and their Poet, Judge, and Druid, A.M. 3300. Roighné "Rosgadach", or "the Glossarist", who invented the alphabet called the Wheel Ogham, and who was the son of Ugaine Mór, Monarch of Erin, A.M. 4600. Historians and Poets of the Milesians; (List in the Book of Ballymote).

The Books of Lecain and Ballymote contain a short piece, in measured prose, ascribed to this Roighné Rosgadach, son of King Ugaine, in answer to his brother Mal, on the peregrinations of his Milesian ancestors, from their departure from Egypt to their arrival in Erin, with the names of their chiefs and leaders. The language and construction of this piece bear, as far as I am able to judge, evidences of a very remote antiquity; and it was, I have no doubt, preserved in the ancient chronicle of Teamar, as well as in the Book of Drom Snèachta.

We have seen in a former Lecture<sup>(20)</sup> that the Monarch Labhairdh Loingseach, the great-grandson of Ugaine Mór, (and Monarch of Erin, about A.M. 4677,) was in his boyhood placed under the special tuition of the Poet Ferceirtné and the Harper Craiftiné; and that these tutors so successfully conducted his education as to enable him while still a mere youth, unknown, and a fugitive, to win honour at a foreign court, and even to rise there rapidly to distinguished military command.

To return to the List in the Book of Ballymote; it proceeds after Ferceirtné to name Morann the son of Maen, the celebrated Judge, about the year of our Lord 14; Nera, the Druid and Lawgiver, son of Morann; Cathbadh, the royal Druid and Philosopher of Ulster, about the year of our Lord 40; Concobar (or Conor) MacNessa, King of Ulster, at the same period; Ferceirtné, King Conor's chief Poet; Ferceirtné, the chief Poet to Curoi MacDairé, King of West Munster, at the same period; Athairné the Satirist of Ulster, and his school, of about the same period; Bricrinn the Satirist, son of Cairbré, of Ulster, at the same period; Amargin the son of Ecsolach, "the smith", of Ulster, about the same period; Critiné the Poet, [whose precise time I have not ascertained]; Sencha, the son of Aitill, chief Judge of Ulster, in Conor MacNessa's time; Dubhdachonn the Royal Satirist; Munnu the learned; Beathach the grandson of Buiredach; Luigeach the Poet, and Fuatach the Poet "of the true problems", whose times and places I have not ascertained; Cormac MacAirt, who was Monarch of Erin in A.D. 266; Fithal

<sup>(20)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History; Lect. XII., (p. 252, et seq.).

LECT. III.

[Historians and Poets
of the Milesians.]

"the true and wise, of heroic words", King Cormac's chief Judge; Finn-Ua-Baisné, or Finn MacCumhaill, Cormac's contemporary; Nera the son of Fincholl, of Sidh Femín (in the present county of Tipperary), whose time I have not ascertained; Morann the son of Cairbré, the stooped; Bresal the farmer of hundreds of cows; and Eithné the daughter of Eman-gaeth, whose time I have not ascertained; Cairbré Liffeachair, Monarch of Erin (son to King Cormac), A.D. 284; Tuan the son of Cairell, who compiled the History of Erin from the Deluge, about the year of our Lord 430; Dubhthach the son of Iugar, of Leinster, the chief Poet and Historian of Tara, and the first who received the Christian faith from Saint Patrick, at Tara, about the year 432; the Committee of Nine who drew up the Seanchas Mór, or Great Body of the Laws of Erin, of whom the Monarch Laoghairé and Saint Patrick were the chiefs, about the year 441; Saints Colum Cillé and Finnia, of Magh Bile, after Patrick; Dallan Ua Forgaill the Royal Poet and Great Scholar of Erin, who wrote the celebrated Elegy on Saint Colum Cillé, in the year 592; Finntán the son of Bochra, after him; "and various Sages, Poets, and Druids, beside these", adds the writer of the tract. He then goes on to name Colman the son of Comgellann, one of the Dalriada of Scotland, who arranged the misunderstanding between the Monarch of Erin, Aedh son of Ainmiré, and the King of Scotland, Aedhan son of Gabran, at the great meeting at Drom Ceat, in the year 590; Cennfúeladh the learned, about the year 640; Seanchán son of Cairbré, the Royal Poet, about the year 670; Cormac MacCullinan, who compiled Cormac's Glossary, about the year 900; etc.

The extent of the List in the Book of Ballymote is very considerable; and notwithstanding all that may be said as to the remoteness and improbability of that part of it which refers to the Tuatha Dé Danann, it presents an important record of a number of persons, stretching over a period of a thousand years, whose names come down to comparatively late times as persons who had by the means of prose or verse contributed to the preservation or perpetuation of the history and antiquities of their country.

Beside this List, I may mention that there is another List of men, (and some women), eminent as judges and expounders of the Law in Ireland, anterior to the coming of Saint Patrick; but as this List will appear in the publication of the Brehon Law Commission, I shall omit it here.

Proceeding from that part of the List in the Book of Ballymote, which brings us down to the commencement of the Christian era, we shall find a greater abundance of detail in other authorities; and among the earlier authors of this period, we find one of the most distinguished on the throne of Erin. LECT. III.

According to the Annals of the Four Masters, Concobar Abradh-ruadh [Conor "of the red eye-brows"] was Monarch of Erin in the year of the world 5193, that is, six years before the Incarnation, according to the chronology followed by the Annalists. Conor was the son of Finn (also a poet and philosopher), King of Leinster, who at this very remote period wrote a genealogical poem on his own ancestors, the Kings of Leinster, from his grandfather the Monarch Nuadha Necht up to Adam. This poem is a most curious and important piece of ancient history and genealogy. The only copy of it that ever I have seen or heard of, is preserved in the Bodleian Library in Oxford (Rawlinson, 502), a manuscript compiled about the year 1100, and written in the most splendid angular Irish hand that I have ever seen. There are many other ancient poems in this volume that I have never seen elsewhere, and by writers quite strange and new to me, whose time I have not yet been able to fix.

Immediately after the time of Concobar Abradh-ruadh, that is, about the time of, and immediately after, the Incarnation, flourished Adhna, a native of Connacht, who was chief Poet of Ulster, and attached to the court of the celebrated King Conor Mac Nessa, at Emania. Adhna was succeeded by his son Neidh  , who maintained and won the extraordinary literary contest for his father's chair, against the learned Ferceirtne  , which contest is still extant, and known as the Dialogue of the Two Sages, (or Professors), a Tract which has been often mentioned in my former course of Lectures.<sup>(21)</sup>

I have already discussed the genuineness of the poem on the Monarch Ollamh Fodhla, ascribed in the Book of Leinster to this Ferceirtne  ; but this is not all that is known of his literary works, as will be presently seen.

There is extant, in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, as well as others, an ancient tract on the Grammar of the Gaellic Language; comparing it, to some extent, with the Hebrew and Greek Languages; but more particularly and copiously with the Latin. This Tract is divided into Four Books. The authorship of the First Book (first in point of composition, though last in the present arrangement), is ascribed to Fenius Farsaidh [Fenius "the Antiquarian"], the ancestor of Milesius, and, according to the very early Milesian traditions, the first person that founded the Great School on the Plain of Shenar, where an

Of Concobar Abradh-ruadh; (Monarch, A.D. 5193, or B.C. 6).

Ancient genealogical poem by Finn, the father of King Concobar Abradh-ruadh.

Of Adhna, chief Poet of Ulster under Conor Mac Nessa

Ancient Gaellic Grammar; part attributed to Fenius Farsaidh, part to Amergin, part to Ferceirtne  , part to Cennfualadh.

<sup>(21)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 383, (etc.).

LECT. III.

[Ancient Gaelic
Grammar.]

attempt was made to collect and teach scientifically the various Languages, after the Confusion at the Tower of Babel. The second book, in point of composition, but the third in the present arrangement, is ascribed to Amernin, the son of Milesius, Poet and Judge of the Milesian Colony; who, it is stated, composed it at the Tochar of Inbher Mór, (which is the place now called Arklow). The third book, in point of composition, but second in the present arrangement, is ascribed to the above Ferceirtne, in the following words:

“The place of writing this Book was Emania; the time was the time of Conor MacNessa; the author was Ferceirtne the Poet; and the cause of composing it was to bring the ignorant and barbarous to true knowledge”.

The fourth book, in point of composition, but the first in the present arrangement, is the well-known book of Cennfaeladh the Learned, (of whom more hereafter), who died in the year 678.

It is quite true that not one of these four parts of this curious grammatical tract can now be found in its primitive simplicity of composition. This tract, as it now stands, was evidently compiled in the ninth century, when the writings of Isidore, Priscian, and Donatus, became so familiar in the Irish Schools; and the object of the writer appears to have been to extend the comparison of the Grammar of the Gaelic Language with that of the Latin, which it would seem had been already touched upon by Cennfaeladh about the year 650.

This grammatical tract bears, I think, internal evidence of its having been written in its present shape either by the celebrated Cormac MacCullinan, King and Archbishop of Cashel, or by some one of the noble school to which he belonged, towards the close of the ninth century.

This tract is too important to be treated of casually, while speaking on other subjects; and I cannot help remarking it as a singular circumstance, that none of the numerous Irish Grammar writers of the last two centuries even refers to its existence, much less to having made any use of it. Indeed I believe I would not be in error if I should say that there are not three Irish Grammar writers, or rather compilers, now living, who ever read it, or even ever heard of it; nor is there now, perhaps, any one man living who could individually make it accessible to the student by reducing it to proper order, though there are scholars capable of accomplishing the task conjointly; and yet until this is done, and Cormac's and other Glossaries published, it is, I think, premature to talk of a complete grammar of the Irish Language.

There is no doubt that from a very early period of our history, it was the pride of the chief Monarch of Erin not only to maintain at his own court, but also to encourage at those of the Provincial Kings and other great local Lords, Poets, Historians, and Lawyers, as well as Druids and Musicians; and if this were the proper place for doing so, I could show the existence of a succession of these officers, from an antiquity long before the time of the Incarnation down to that period when Criomthan Nia Nair was Monarch of Erin, and Conor MacNessa King of Ulster. An early recorded instance of the existence of such officers is to be found in a very ancient tract, called the Battle of Ros-na-Righ, a battle fought between this Monarch of Erin and Conor King of Ulster; in which it is stated that Eochaidh the Learned, Diarmaid the Poet, and Fergus the Novelist, or Romance writer, of the King, were killed in that battle, by Conall Cearnach.

LECT. III.
Of Literary offices in connection with the Monarch's court, in early times.

At this time, that is, in Conor's reign, so far had the taste for learning of all kinds, but poetry, music, and druidism in particular, seized on the national mind, that it is recorded that more than a third of the men of Erin had then given themselves up to the cultivation and teaching of these seductive sciences; and by being admitted into the ranks of the Fileadh and Ollamhs, (whose educational organization was explained in a former Lecture), they were enabled to gain legal privileges which secured them the enjoyment of sustenance and rank, at the expense of the unlearned portion of the community. The producing classes soon began to feel the weight of supporting, in unproductive pursuits, so large a section of the population; and the complaints against them speedily became loud and threatening, throughout the East, South, and West of Erin. The professional chief Poets, therefore, called a meeting of their body to take measures for their own safety, and to consider whether they should not even take refuge in banishment, passing into Scotland until the storm should have abated. When, however, the learned as well as powerful King Conor MacNessa heard of their distress, he, with the consent of his people, invited them into Ulster; and here, it is recorded, the legion of learned men and scholars were hospitably entertained for the space of seven years.

State of learning in the time of
*Conor Mac
Nessa*.

On two subsequent occasions the poets received again the protection and hospitality of the old Ultonians in their more limited territory of Uladh or Ulidia; namely, once in the time of Fiachna son of Baedan, King of Ulidia, who was slain in the year 622; and again in the time of his successor, Maelcobha, who was slain in the year 646; but the greatest danger that ever threatened them arose in the reign of the Monarch Aedh son of Ainmiré, son of Sedna, who reigned over Erin from A.D. 568 to 594. And though it is anticipating a little the chronological order, it may be as well to mention here this instance, in connection with those just alluded to, as an illustration of the consequences of the ancient system of encouragement to learning, even when education had already become so generally diffused throughout the island.

LECT. III.

Of the "Pot of Avarice" of the Fí-leadh.

At this time the Fíleadh, or poets, it would appear, became more troublesome and importunate than ever. A singular custom is recorded to have prevailed among their profession from a very early period. They were in the habit of travelling through the country, as I have already mentioned, in groups or companies, of thirty, composed of teachers and pupils, under a single chief or master. In these progresses, when they came to a house, the first man of them that entered began to chant the first verse of a poem; the last man of the party responded to him; and so the whole poem was sung, each taking a part, in that order. Now each company of Poets had a silver pot, which was called Coiré Sainnté, literally the Pot of Avarice; every pot having nine chains of bronze attached to it by golden hooks; and it was suspended from the points of the spears of nine of the company, which were thrust through the links at the other ends of the chains. The reason—(according to the account of this custom preserved in the Leabhar Mór Duna Doighré, called the Leabhar Breac, [R.I.A.])—that the pot was called the "Pot of Avarice", was, because it was into it that whatever of gold or silver they received was put; and whilst the poem was being chanted, the best nine musicians in the company played music around the pot. This custom was, no doubt, very picturesque; but the actors in it were capable of showing themselves in two different characters, according to the result of their application. If their Pot of Avarice received the approbation of the man of the house, in gold or silver, a laudatory poem was written for him; but if it did not he was satirized in the most virulent terms that a copious and highly expressive language could supply.

Now, so confident always were the Poets in the influence which their satirical powers had over the actions of the people of all classes, that, in the year of our Lord 590, a company of them waited on the Monarch Aedh (or Hugh) son of Ainmiré, and threatened to satirize him if he did not give them the Roth Croi itself,—the Royal Brooch,—which from the remotest times descended from Monarch to Monarch of Erin, and which is recorded to have been worn as the chief distinctive emblem of the legitimate sovereign. Aedh (Hugh), however, had not only the moral courage to refuse so audacious a demand, but in his indignation he even ordered the banishment of the whole profession out of the country; and, in compliance with this order, they collected in great numbers into Ulidia, once more, where they again received a temporary asylum.

In the proper order of time, we shall have to return again to this King Aedh, in reference to the General Revision which took place, in his time, of the Laws concerning Education and the Profession of Learning.

Having so far adduced what I trust will be found satisfactory evidence of the cultivation of the native Language and Literature of Erin centuries before the introduction of Christianity, I proceed to name a few of the prominent Scholars, lay and ecclesiastical, from Ferceirtne, and those already mentioned, down through the second, third, and fourth centuries; in short, to the arrival of Saint Patrick, in the fifth; and to continue the list of the more eminent lay and ecclesiastical writers, in the Gaelic Language, from that period down to the eleventh century.

List of eminent men of learning continued.

In the list of writers of Ancient Irish History, in the Book of Ballymote, we find the Poet and Satirist Athairné and his school or pupils about the middle of the first century; succeeded by his son Fergus, and his pupils, who must have continued their teaching down to and into the second century.

We find from the ancient tract called Bailé an Scáil, described in a former Lecture,<sup>(22)</sup> that Conn of the Hundred Battles, (who began his reign A.D. 123), had always in his company three Poets. Those mentioned in that tract were named Eiham, Corb, and Cesarn; and we have it from other authorities, that Eochaidh, the Rígh Eigeas or Royal Poet, was also attached to his court.

Oilioll Oluim, King of Munster (who flourished from A.D. 186 to 234), was the author of several poems, three of which are preserved in the Book of Leinster. The first appears to have been addressed to the chiefs of his own family or race, immediately before the Battle of Ceann Abrat, (or Féabhrat), which took place near Cill Finan (but in the county of Cork), and in which he defeated his stepson MacCon; the second, on the death of his seven sons, in the Battle of Magh Mucroimhé (in the county of Galway), fought in the year 195; and the third was addressed to his grandson Fiacha Muillethan, whose mother died at giving him birth, and whose father, Eoghan Mór, eldest son of the old king, was slain in the above battle. There can be no doubt of the great antiquity of these pieces; and scarcely any, in my opinion, of their authenticity. It is true that some Christian allusions enter into the third poem; but I am disposed to believe that these were introduced at a much later but still remote time, though for what special purpose cannot be now divined. But it would be impossible, consistently with the plan of these Lectures, to enter into any minute critical investigation upon such a subject; and I am forced to content myself for the present, with the expression of the opinion at which I have arrived as to the authenticity or antiquity of the various tracts of which I have to speak. To proceed:

Poems of King Oilioll Oluim.

<sup>(22)</sup> Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 385, (etc.).

LECT. III.

Poems by King Art
"the Solitary".

The Monarch Art "the Solitary", son and successor to Conn of the Hundred Battles, and who, with his nephews the seven sons of Oilioll, fell in the Battle of Magh Muicroidh  , just mentioned, was the author of a poem on the place of his own sepulture (Treoit, now Trevit, in Meath). A very ancient copy of this curious poem, with a gloss, is preserved in Leabhar na-h-Uidhr   (R.I.A.), a manuscript compiled before the year 1106.

Foundation
of a University by Cormac Mac Art; (third century).

The Monarch Cormac, the son of Art the Solitary, occupied the throne of Erin from the year 227 to the year 268; and enough has been said in several former Lectures to prove that our national literature attained to the highest degree of cultivation during his illustrious reign, which covers so great a portion of the third century. It may be interesting, however, to introduce here a single extract respecting this king, because it contains an instance of the very early organization of Education, and its division into several departments; in fact, an early instance of a species of University, founded by Cormac at Tara, the seat of the monarchy. I quote from O'Flaherty's Ogygia (Hely's translation, vol. ii., page 239):

"Cormac exceeded all his predecessors in magnificence, munificence, wisdom, and learning, as also in military achievements. His palace was most superbly adorned and richly furnished, and his numerous family proclaim his majesty and munificence; the books he published, and the schools he endowed at Temor bear unquestionable testimony of his learning; there were three schools instituted, in the first the most eminent professors of the art of war were engaged, in the second history was taught, and in the third jurisprudence was professed. There is a poem consisting of 183 distichs of these three universities, of the grandeur of Temor in the reign of Cormac, and of his encomiums and exploits; this poem is compiled in O'Duvedan's book, fol. 175, which begins thus:

"Teamhair na riogh rath Chormaic".<sup>23</sup>

[ "Temor of the Kings is Cormac's royal seat." ]

This poem is, I should observe, of great authority. The Book of O'Duвеgan was that compiled by the celebrated scholar Seaan Mór O'Dubhagan, Ollamh of Ui Mainé (or O'Kelly's country), in Connacht, who died in the year 1372. This book is now in the enlightened keeping of Lord Ashburnham, and is, accordingly, inaccessible to the historical student.

LECT. III.
The Book of O'Duвеgan.

Contemporary with Cormac was the celebrated Finn Mac Cumhaill, the poet and warrior. Finn, according to an ancient poem in my possession, was educated for the poetic profession, and studied under Cethern the son of Fintan; but having taken more freedom with one of the daughters of the Monarch Conn, at Tara, than her father approved of, the young bard was obliged to fly the court and to abandon his gentle profession for the more rough and dangerous one of arms. Finn lived to the year 283, when he was slain, at a very advanced age. I gave in a former Lecture a very full list and description of the pieces of poetry that are ascribed to him in our old books.<sup>(24)</sup>

Literary education of *Finn Mac
Cumhaill*.

Finn was succeeded, at least in his literary profession, by his sons Oisín and Fergus, and by his cousin Cuálté; from the compositions of all of whom quotations are made in the ancient topographical tract called the Dinnseanchas.

That the fourth century was not more deficient in native scholars we have undoubted authority. The celebrated Niall "of the Nine Hostages" was born in the second half of this century. He succeeded his father in the monarchy in the year 379, and was slain on the bank of the river Loire, in France, in the year 405, by his old enemy and competitor for the throne of Erin, Eochaidh the son of Enna Ceinselach, a prince of Leinster. Niall was fostered and educated in the ancient district of Ui Torna (in which is situated the well-known "Abbey O'Dorney", in the modern county of Kerry), by Torna Eigeas (or Torna "the learned poet"), from whom this district derives the name which it bears even to this day. Torna Eigeas fills a very high place among the learned poets of ancient Erin.

Of learning
under Niall
Naoi-Ghalt
lach. (cf.
Torna Eigeas.)

Of Torna's reputed compositions, I am acquainted with five short pieces, two of which are of undoubted antiquity; but the three others, though still of an old date, must nevertheless have undergone great modification in style, if ever they were written by so early an author.

The first of the two really ancient poems to which I refer, is one consisting of thirteen stanzas, or fifty-two lines, composed by Torna alternately with his son, on the untimely death of the great King Niall, as already described. The son opens the lament in the following lines:

<sup>(24)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, pp. 301; 395; (etc.).

LECT. III.

[Of Torna
Eigeas.]

“ When we used to go to the assembly
 Along with the son of Eochaidh Muighmheadhoin,
 As yellow as shining Sobairché<sup>(25)</sup> was the hair
 Upon the head of the son of Cairen,<sup>(26)</sup>

Torna is pleased with the similitude; and answers:

“ My worthy son, so well hast thou spoken,
 A Cumal [three cows] to it is meet to be given In honour of that hair which thou hast compared With the [golden] top of the Sobairché”.

Torna then describes the King's eyebrows, his eyelashes, and eyes; comparing them in colour with certain berries of the woods. The son replies by describing his cheeks, comparing them to the opening blossoms of certain trees. Torna next describes his pearly teeth and red lips, his countenance like the moon, like the sun, like a glowing fire. The son then compares the lamentation of the people of Erin, for Niall, with the moaning of the wind over a desert island; and says that now, when he is gone, the Saxons, the Albans, and the Gaedhils will roam uncontrolled in all directions. Torna says that the screaming Saxons, and parties of the Lombards “from Latium”, will now seek to oppress the Gaedhils and the Picts. The son then bears witness to the bravery of Niall's sons; Eoghan, Laeghairé, Enna, Fiacha, Conall, and Cairpré. And Torna finally winds up by bearing testimony to the happiness which he himself, and all men enjoyed, when they went to the Assembly of Tara with King Niall.

There is one point in this poem which would appear to bear something against its authenticity, namely, the introduction of the Lombards into it, at a time in which it is supposed, though not clearly established, I believe, that they had not received that name. And with this, which in my mind is not however an exception, there is nothing in this curious poem to deduct from it a single year of the remote antiquity to which it is referred, namely, the year of our Lord 405, or twenty-seven years before the arrival of Saint Patrick.

This poem is to be found in the Library of T.C.D. (in the “Yellow Book of Lecain”, H. 2. 16.).

The next poem in point of antiquity, which I find ascribed to Torna Eigeas, is one which I shall reserve until I come to speak presently of the death of the Monarch Dathi, who succeeded Niall, and who was slain in the year 428.

Of the other three poems ascribed to Torna, two of them, if genuine, should date farther back than Niall's death, and one after. The first of these poems consists of thirteen stanzas, or fifty-two lines, beginning: LECT. III.

<sup>(25)</sup> The “Sobairché” was the plant called “Herba Sancti Petri” [Hypericum quadrangulum — LIN.]

<sup>(26)</sup> The mother of Niall.

[Of Torna
Eigeas.]

“Receive my precept, O noble Niall”.<sup>(27)</sup>

The poet then proclaims his love and affection for his two royal pupils, Niall, the future Monarch of Erin, and Corc, the future King of Munster; and says that each possesses half his heart. The learned tutor then addresses himself particularly to Niall, and in good and forcible language lays down for him a set of philosophical instructions or rules for the government of his kingdom, as well as for his own government.

The oldest version I know of this poem is that in a vellum manuscript in T.C.D. (H. 4. 22); one not older than the fifteenth century. The poem, however, is much older than that century; but certainly in its present style and diction, not within some hundreds of years of Torna's time. Indeed I am inclined to look upon it rather as an imitation, on a very small scale, and in quite an inferior style, of Fotha-na-Candóine's inaugural poem of Instructions, written for his pupil Aedh Oirdnidhé, on his elevation to the Monarchy of Erin, in the year 793.

The second of these three poems, in order of date, is one of fifty-six stanzas, in which Torna relates, that on one occasion it came to the ears of his pupil Niall that his other pupil Corc, King of Cashel, had boasted of his intention to put forth his right to the monarchy, and his determination to enforce that right by force of arms. He proceeds: As soon as King Niall had heard of his foster-brother's designs, he raised an army at Tara, and vowed that he would march into Munster, and reduce him to more becoming obedience. When Corc received this account, he immediately marshalled four battalions of brave warriors, at Cashel, determined to meet his great opponent on the borders of his province, and to prevent his entering it, with all his might. Torna relates that when he found matters come to this point, he presented himself to the King of Cashel, and begged of him, for the love and duty he bore and owed to him, Torna, as his foster-father and tutor, to stay his march, and allow him to repair to Tara to heal the wounded pride of Niall, and dissuade him from carrying his intended invasion of Munster into effect. This request was granted; and Torna repaired to Tara on his mission of peace, where he ascribed Corc's ambitious declarations to his more youthful inexperience, and to a boastful or braggart disposition in his race. To these unwarranted and

(27) original:—“Ṣab mo tēgarc, a néill náir”.

LECT. III.
[Of Torna
Eigeas.]

damaging excuses, Niall added very reproachful words against the King of Cashel; and having consulted the wishes of his people, it was unanimously decided to undertake the expedition. The army, consisting of nine battalions, marched forward until they arrived at Lothra, in Ormond (in the present county of Tipperary), where Niall pitched his camp, from which he pillaged and ravaged all the territory of Ormond and Ely, around him. Here Torna, who still continued with Niall, was sent by Brian, the Monarch's brother, and the actual leader of the expedition, to Core, calling upon him to come in and deliver hostages, before the army marched further into the country. Torna went, and met Core, nothing daunted, at the head of his troops, at Bearnan Eile, (now called the Devil's Bit), where he delivered his message to him, and urged him to agree to it, which he found himself compelled to do. Core then, at the head of five hundred horsemen, went forward to Niall's camp, where he was joyfully received, and peace and amity were re-established between them; after which, Core returned to Cashel, leaving hostages in the hands of Niall, and receiving from him a present of "one thousand horses, five hundred suits of armour, nine score rings of gold, and fifty costly drinking horns".

This poem is well known in the south of Ireland; and the more so, because about the year 1604, it gave rise to the curious and valuable tract so well known by the title of the "Contention of the Bards", a series of historico-controversial poems, which sprang out of a poem written by Tady MacBruody, one of the last, if not the last, of the hereditary poets and historians of the O'Briens, and the other Dalcassian families of Thomond. In this piece MacBruody severely criticises Torna's poem;—admitting its genuineness; but charging the author, who was of Ulster extraction, with partiality for Niall, and the northern, or Eremonian, races. MacBruody was learnedly answered by Lugaidh O'Clerigh, of Donegal, and several other northern scholars; but as I have given a pretty fair description of this controversy in a former Lecture,<sup>(28)</sup> I shall not follow it farther on the present occasion. As the genuineness of Torna's poem, however, has for more than two hundred years been made the subject of criticism and doubt, I shall translate here the first stanza, for the purpose of identification; and the two concluding stanzas, for the purpose of offering a few remarks upon them.

The poem commences as follows:

<sup>(28)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 141.

" A meeting of battle between Corc and Niall, Whether at hand, or whether far distant;
 Fierce the tramp over every shore,
 Of Niall, the son of Eócha Muighmheadhoin.<sup>(29)</sup>

The two concluding verses run as follows:

" Sad is my condition, now, at last,
 All my relatives have passed away,
 In bitter grief for Corc and Niall;
 Receiving neither gifts nor spoils.
 " The Assembly of the world's men, at the end,
 Upon the summit of Mount Sion,
 Rendering an account to all-just Christ,—
 May I be brought to that great Assembly".<sup>(30)</sup>

Now there is nothing in the whole of this certainly very old poem,—making allowance for the present corrupt copies,—which could be deemed inconsistent with its being the genuine composition of Torna Eigeas, excepting these two concluding stanzas; the first of which makes the poet alive after the year 438, in which year Corc, King of Cashel, is said to have attended the great Feast of Tara, to give his assent to the Seanchas Mór, six years after the arrival of Saint Patrick; and the last stanza of all, which speaks the language of mature Christianity.

It is not easy to believe that Torna, who was the foster-father and tutor of Niall, who was slain in the year 405, and of Corc, who lived down to the year 438, at least, could have survived his two pupils; but if we could believe that he survived Corc, the difficulty of his having been a Christian would be obviated.

The learned O'Flaherty, in his Ogygia, at the reign of Niall of the Nine Hostages, denies the possibility of Torna having been alive at the coming of Saint Patrick, in 432, or of Corc of Cashel being alive in 438, to give his assent to the Seanchas Mór. After describing the present poem, he disposes, as he thinks, of its authenticity, in the following words:

" But to return to the poem. I am of opinion that Corc, (29) original:—"Dáil eada roip Corc ir Niall,

 A bfofur nó a n-eroincian;
 Dorb a tpeastan tar gac tparáig,
 Niall mac eadae muighmeadhoin".

(30) "Tparáig mo d'áil-rí fa deóir,
 Tarpa mo tpaoba cemeóil;
 Cumairé cuirp ir néill róm tparáir
 Ní b-fágaím ág ná éadail.
 Dáil rí n-uomáin ró deóir
 Ar mullaé sléibe Síón,
 Ág tabairt cuirp vo chuirp éairé,
 Beartar murrí ran mór d'áil".

LECT. III.

[Of Torna Eigeas.]

Of the presence of Corc at Tara, on the revision of the Seanchas Mór; (A.D. 438).

LECT. II.
[Of the presence of Core at Tara,
A.D. 438.]

who, as he [Torna] declares, was very young in school, and in his youth a contemporary with Niall in the kingdom, was much older, as he was cousin to the father-in-law of Niall; and I am convinced he died before the commencement of Niall's reign, because King Crimthann, the successor of Niall, had substituted Conall Eachluaith in the government of Munster, after the decease of Core, as Dr. Keting assures us in his account of the reign of Crimthann, extracted from Cormac O'Culennan, Bishop and King of Munster, who was exceedingly well informed in the antiquities of his country.

"Wherefore their mistake appears the more manifest in Colgan, who insinuates that Core was coeval with Saint Patrick, in the year of Christ 438; whereas Aengus, the grandson of Core, was the first King of Munster, according to the account of all our antiquaries, who, by the means of Saint Patrick, embraced the Christian religion.

"Whether Torna was the author of that poem, or in what age he flourished, and whether he was a Christian, are matters with which I am not acquainted; this only I shall beg leave to inculcate, that it has been a practice among the ancients to publish their works under the names of others, that their assertions might gain the greater weight and authority, as Cicero declares, de Senectute.—I shall also insinuate that Torna lived after Dathi, the successor of Niall, if that poem concerning the sepulchre of the Kings of Cruachan be ascribed to him, which I am very confident is of a later date".<sup>(31)</sup>

It will have been seen that O'Flaherty in these passages endeavours to show that this poem could not be genuine, because, in the first instance, Core, the King of Munster who is mentioned in it as contemporary with the Monarch Niall, must have been much older than him, and died long before him; and he gives as the grounds of this opinion, a passage in Keting, in which it is stated that the Monarch Crimthann, the grand-nephew of Core, and who died in the year 378, had given the government of Munster to Conall Eachluaith of the Dalcassian race, after the death of Core, and consequently long before the death of King Niall, which took place in the year 405.

O'Flaherty is right in his calculations here, as far as Keting may be correct; for Keting states that the throne of Cashel, or Munster, having become vacant in the Monarch Crimthann's reign, the latter appointed to it his own foster-son Conall Eachluaith, of the Dalcassian race; that the nobles of the Eugenic or South Munster race felt displeased at this, alleging that they had of their own line a most eligible person to elect as their

<sup>(31)</sup> Ogygia, vol. ii. p. 340; Hely's (very inaccurate) translation.

King, and one who had a prior right to the succession, namely, Core, son of Lugaidh; that the monarch referred the question to the learned men of Munster; and that they decided that Core should succeed to the government of the province, in the first instance, with reversion, on his death, to Conall Eachluaith, or if he should not be living then, to his next heir; and that this decision was acted upon, that Core assumed the government (but his years are not given), and that on his death Conall Eachluaith succeeded.

LECT. III.
[Of the presence of Core at Tara, A.D. 438.]

Such is the account given in all the copies of Keting that I am acquainted with, and some of these are as old as the author's time; (though we have never seen his autograph, so as to be able to state positively that these are his words.)

The statement, however, is not correct; since it is well known that Conall Eachluaith never was King of Munster, and it is indeed more than probable that he died before Core.

Of the oldest authorities for the succession of the Kings of Munster with which I am acquainted, the first is Seaan Mór O'Dubhagain's poem, who died in the year 1372; in which he sets forth the names and the length of the reign of each of the Kings of Cashel, or Munster, from Eoghan Mór, who was slain in the Battle of Magh Lena, in the year 153, down to Domhnall Mór O'Brien, the last of the Kings of Munster, who died in the year 1194. The poet does not give the years of Eoghan's reign, but begins his computation with his son, Oilioll Oluim, who reigned sixty years, and died in the year 234, of extreme old age. The reigns then counted are as follows:

The Succession of the Kings of Munster.

Cormac Cas, forty years; Fiacha Muillethan, forty years; Mogh Corb, twenty years; Oilioll Flann Mór, twenty years; Oilioll Flann Beg, thirty years; Eochaidh, fifteen years; Core (the subject of our discussion), thirty years.

Now, if to the year 234, in which Oilioll Oluim died, we add the seven succeeding reigns, including that of Core, they bring us down to the year 429, or three years before the coming of Saint Patrick, in the year 432, and nine years before the reputed compilation of the Seanchas Mór, at which he is said to have been present.

After Seaan O'Dubhagain, the next authority is the Book of Ballymote, compiled in the year 1391, at folio 38 of which is found this same list of reigns, in prose, and agreeing exactly with the poem, except in the matter of one year: for the poem makes the reign of Eochaidh, Core's immediate predecessor, fifteen years, while the prose makes it sixteen, thus bringing Core's death down to the year 430.

My third authority is Dubhaltach Mac Firbisigh, who com-

LECT. III.
[Of the presence of
Core at Tara,
A.D. 438.]

piled his great genealogical Book in the year 1650. At page 688 of that work this list is to be found, agreeing exactly with O'Dubhagain's Poem. The original list was also preserved in the ancient Book of Leinster; but the earlier part of it is now lost, as well as many other important articles from that valuable manuscript.

This list of reigns, extending from the year 174, in which Oilioll Oluim began to govern, down to the death of Core, in the year 429 or 430, disposes, I think, of O'Flaherty's assertions, founded on an erroneous passage in Keting:—that Core died before the death of the Monarch Crimthann, which happened in the year 378; and that Conall Eachluath, of the Dalcassian race, whose name is not found in any of the three copies, succeeded Core before that year; and, therefore, that Core could not have been present at, or have given his assent to, the Seanchas Mór.

O'Flaherty argues also that Core could not have given his assent to the Seanchas Mór, because he could not have been a Christian; since his grandson, Aengus the son of Natfraech, who succeeded in 422, was the first-Christian King of Munster, having been baptized by Saint Patrick in person. Now, this is not sound reasoning; for it is very clear that the six years which intervened between Saint Patrick's coming and the year assigned to the compilation of the Seanchas Mór, were quite insufficient for the conversion of the Irish people and their Kings and Chiefs. It is, therefore, quite possible, if not positive, that numbers of those who attended the Great Feast of Tara, on that occasion, were still unbelievers; and there is every reason to believe that the Monarch Laeghairé himself, who convened the meeting, and professed himself a Christian, did so more in obedience to the growing moral influence and popularity of Saint Patrick, than to the dictates of conscience, or any vivid appreciation of the Gospel.

It was stated in a former Lecture, that the compilation or revision of the laws of the land had been entrusted, by the Kings and Nobles who attended at this great assembly, at Tara, to a Committee of Nine, to be composed of three Kings, three Bishops, and three Poets, or lay Philosophers; and that the nine persons so selected were, Laeghairé the Monarch, Core King of Munster, and Dairé King of Ulster, to represent the Kings and Nobles; Saint Patrick, himself, Saint Benen (or Benignus), his pupil, and Saint Cairnech, to represent the Christian Church; and the Poets Dubhthach, Ros, and Fergus, to represent the lay literary professions. Now, it is very doubtful, as I have already said, that Laeghairé himself was a true believer at this time, or indeed at any time. His son and subsequent successor, Lugaidh, certainly was not. It is also quite certain, according to the Tripartite Life of Saint Patrick, that Dairé, the King of Ulster, one of the Committee of Nine, was not a Christian at the time, nor for nineteen years after, till the year in which Armagh was founded; though he had, indeed, some time previously, given Saint Patrick the site of a church, in the same neighbourhood. It is certain that the Poet Dubh-thach had been converted previously to the meeting; and there is good reason to believe that the Poet Ros also had been converted previously; but there is no reason whatever to believe that the third Poet, Fergus, had become a believer at the time.

LECT. III.
[Of the presence of
Corc at Tara,
A.D. 438.]

Having now shown that some members, at least, of the Committee of Nine, were still pagans at the time of its constitution, I have, I trust, satisfactorily removed the second of O'Flaherty's reasons why Corc the King of Cashel could not have been one of them, namely, that he could not have been converted at the time. And this altogether passing over the possibility of Corc having become a Christian (which he is recorded to have done, in one ancient account of the Seanchas Mór), as many others had done, in Erin, before Saint Patrick's coming. If the Seanchas Mór was compiled at all, at the time and under the circumstances laid down by all our ancient authorities without a single dissenting word, whoever was the King of Munster present must have been a pagan, since the baptism, but certainly not the conversion, by Saint Patrick, of Aengus King of that province, did not take place (supposing his grandfather Corc to have died in 430), until the year 442, or four years after the universally acknowledged date of the compilation.

Next it is argued that Corc could not have lived so late as the year 438, because his nephew, the Monarch Crimthann (son to Dairé Cearba, his younger brother), was cut off in the prime of life, in the year 366. This argument, however, falls to the ground at once, if we place any reliance on the Chronology of O'Dubhagáin's poem, and the list in the Book of Ballymote; in both of which the death of Oilioll Flann Beg, the grandfather of Corc, is brought down to the year 384; and surely there is nothing wonderful or incredible in the fact that a man should live fifty-four years after his grandfather's death (that number being the difference between the years 384 and 438, in which the Seanchas Mór was compiled); neither is there anything unreasonable in the belief that the grandson's tutor might, by possibility, survive his pupil say by a single year, and have lived to lament his death and that of his other and older pupil, the Monarch Niall, who was cut off prematurely in the year 405.

LECT. III.

[Of the presence of Core at Tara,
A.D. 438.]

It is a curious coincidence, too, that Aengus, the grandson of Core, was, according to the Annals of the Four Masters, killed at the Battle of Cell Osnadh, near Leithghlinn (in the present county of Carlow), in the year 488, just fifty-eight years after his grandfather Core, supposing him to have died in 430; and still, Aengus, as I have said, was killed in battle.

Having thus satisfactorily, I hope, though tediously, I fear, demonstrated the perfect possibility of Core King of Cashel having been present at the compilation of the Seanchas Mór, it only remains for me, now, to dispose of the discrepancy of eight years, between the time of that compilation and Core's death, as found in the authorities already quoted. On this part of the argument I need, I think, say but little, having already shown, in one of my early Lectures, how, in the lapse of centuries, chronology, which requires so much accuracy in its transmission, (and particularly with regard to mere numbers), was so very liable to irregularity and error; error arising both from the obscurity of old manuscripts, the carelessness or unavoidable mistakes of translators, and the probably inaccurate calculation of broken years, not to say anything of the use, from time to time, of different systems of computation.

It is, therefore, not a matter of suspicion, but a matter of admiration, that in a series of events, commencing in the year 234, and handed down, by manual transcription, to the year 1391, these accounts should, in one particular instance (or indeed in many), differ to the extent of some eight or nine years from the date of one or more other events transmitted through a medium equally liable to slight inaccuracy of this kind.

This, I find, has been a much longer and more unreasonable digression than I had at all intended; but as the subject has been discussed adversely by O'Flaherty, in his Ogygia, by the Rev. Dr. Lanigan, in his Ecclesiastical History, and by Dr. Petrie, in his valuable Essay on the Antiquities of the Hill of Tara, as well as by others; and as it will come under a more thorough examination in the forthcoming publication of the Brehon Law Commission; I have been tempted to throw together some of the more important of those facts which my own considerable reading and many years' attention to the subject have enabled me to collect; in order that such as have studied, or may hereafter devote attention to, this important event in our history, may see and know that there is a great deal more to be said on it than has been thought of in modern times.

LECTURE IV.

[Delivered 4th June, 1857.]

(III.) EDUCATION, AND LITERATURE; (continued). Of Laidcenn the Poet. Popular belief in the power of a Poet's Satire. Of Finnchaomh, Poet of King Dathi. Torna Eigeas' Poem on Roilig na Righ. Of the Poets of the Court of King Laeghaire, (temp. St. Patrick). Druids of King Laeghaire. Of the cultivation of the Gaelhelic language in the early ages of the Church in Erin. Of the early Gaelhelic writers after the introduction of Christianity;—Bishop Fiacc, etc. The Ecclesiastical Schools of the early period not exclusively ecclesiastical. Of secular National Schools in the early Christian ages in Erin. Of the Feis of Drom Ceat (A.D. 590);—revision there of the National system of Education. Of the Chief Poet Dallan Forgaill. Of Laws concerning the Profession of Teaching. Of the nature of the lay instruction in the early Christian Schools. Origin of "Sizars", or "Poor Scholars". Story of St. Adamnan and King Finnmacha. Early Education of St. Colum Cille. Students' Hut Encampments. Of the foreign students at Armagh; (temp. Bede.) Of Secular Education in Ancient Erin. Of Fimtain the Poet, and Cathal the son of King Ragallach, (A.D. 645). Of the qualification of a Fer-Leighin, or Head Master of a Public School. Of the Professors in a Public School or College. List of early Ecclesiastics distinguished as Men of Letters. Of the Poet Seanchan Torpeist (A.D. 600). Story of Seanchan and King Guaire. Legendary account of Seanchan's recovery of the heroic Tale of the Tain Bo Chuailgne.

IN giving an account of the succession of learned men by whom our ancient Literature and History were preserved<sup>1</sup> and carried down, and in whom we have examples of the education of our people in ancient times, I had reached the reign of Niall "of the Nine Hostages", (at the end of the fourth century), before the digression which I was obliged to make in order to clear up an embarrassing difficulty as to the appearance of King Core at Tara in Saint Patrick's time. I had just spoken of the celebrated scholar of that age, Torna Eigeas.

Contemporary with Torna was Laidcenn, the son of Bairced,<sup>Of Laidcenn the Poet.</sup> a distinguished poet and scholar who was also attached to the court of the Monarch Niall at Tara, but whose private residence was at Rath Beccé, (a place now called Rathbeggan, near Dunboyne, in the county of Meath).

Of Laidcenn we have at least one anecdote. Among other hostage-prisoners Niall had at his court Eochaidh, the son and hostage of Enna Ceinnsetaigh, King of Leinster. This young prince after some time became unhappy at his condition, and at last took an opportunity to escape from Tara, and fly to the south, to his own country. He had run as far as Laidcenn's residence

LECT. IV. (at Rathbeggan), when feeling exhausted he entered the house and requested refreshment; but it was refused him. Eochaidh was accordingly obliged to proceed on his way towards home; but he soon returned with a band of followers to the poet's house to punish him for his inhospitable conduct; and he burned down the house and slew in it Laidcenn's only son. The poet, we are told, for a full year after that continued to satirise the men of Leinster; and, (according to the belief of the time), by his satires to bring fatalities upon them, "so that neither corn, grass, nor foliage could grow for them, during the whole year".

Popular belief in the power of a Poet's satire

The subject of this strange belief in the power of a poet would be one of great interest to investigate. But its investigation could only be satisfactorily made by a minute comparison and examination of all the instances recorded of it in our numerous records and tales. And in the present course of Lectures such an inquiry would be manifestly out of place.

Of Finchaomh's Poem of King Dathi.

The reign of Niall came to an end in the year 405; and he was succeeded by his cousin the celebrated warrior-king Dathi, who was killed, after a reign of twenty-three years, at the foot of the Alps, by a flash of lightning. Dathi is recorded to have been accompanied on this his last continental expedition by his Poet Finchaomh; of whose compositions there are three short pieces quoted in the prose account of this expedition described in a former Lecture,<sup>(32)</sup> as well as three or four short extempore pieces, ascribed to Dathi himself. Dathi's body, it is recorded, was brought home by his faithful officers Dungalach, Flanngas, Tomaltach, and Tuathal; and buried at Relig-na-Righ, ("the Cemetery of the Kings"), at the ancient Palace of Cruachan, in Connacht, (near the present town of Carrick-on-Shannon), under the Coirthe Dearg, or "Red Stone", as mentioned in the Lecture just alluded to.

Torna Eigeas' Poem on Relig-na Righ.

Some years after the interment of Dathi, the Poet Torna Eigeas, already mentioned, who appears to have lived to a great age, happened, we are told, to be present at the Great Fair of Cruachan (which was held at the Cemetery), at a time when some doubts were entertained as to whether King Dathi's body had been buried there at all; and the people requested the learned poet to discover for them, "through the magic of his poetic art", (as they said,) whether such was the fact or not. Upon this Torna pointed out the Monarch's grave, beneath the Coirthe Dearg, (or Red Rock), in the Cemetery; and at the same time he addressed the following poem, of ten stanzas, to the Old Palace and Cemetery, in which he enumerates a few of the more remarkable personages who had been previously buried there; from which poem it would appear that the Hill of Cruachan (which at first was called Druim na n-druadh, or the "Hill of the Druids"), must have been a pagan cemetery long before the building of the first Royal Palace there by the Monarch Eochaidh Feidlech.<sup>(33)</sup>

<sup>(32)</sup> See Lect. XIII.; Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 284, et seq.

LECT. IV.

Torna Eit-geas' Poem on Relig na
Righ.

This poem never having been published (except a spurious and defective version by Dermot O'Connor in his inaccurate translation of Doctor Keting's History of Ireland, in the year 1721), I may venture to give here the following literal translation from the best copy of it now extant. It is found in the ancient Leabhar na h-Uidhré, in the Royal Irish Academy. It will be remembered that the verses are addressed to the Palace and Cemetery of Cruachan:

- " There lies under thee the King of the men of Inis Fuil, Dathi the son of Fiachra the triumphant,
O Cruachan, which doth this conceal
 From foreigners and from the Gaedhils!
- " There lies under thee Dungalach the vehement,
 Who brought the king home over the trackless sea;
 There lie beneath thee, too, with similar renown,
Tuathal, Flunngus, and Tomaltach.
- " The three fair sons of Eochaidh Feidleach Lie within thy mound, in thy pleasant mound;
 And Eocha Airemh, lying low,
 Who was killed by Mael Mór.
- " Eochu Feidhleach the kingly is
 In it; and Deirbrin the beautiful;
 And Clothra, no reproachful fact;
 And Medbh; and Muiresg.
- " Eiré, and Fodhla, and Banbha,— Three young women, beautiful, admirable,— Though it was not here they lived, [lit. spent their wealth]
 Yet it is Cruachan that [now] conceals them.
- " MacCuill; MacGreiné, of bright career;
MacCeht, whose grave is not less famed;
 In the Rath of Cruachain they are concealed.
 Not a few does the single flag conceal!
- " Labraidh Loingsech, no niggardly king;
Midir, of the Tuatha Dé Danann race;

(33) The Palace of Cruachan was erected by Eochaidh for his daughter, the celebrated Medhbh, or Meave, whom he had set up as Queen of Olnegmacht, as the province now called Connacht was then named, about fifty years before the Incarnation.

LECT. IV.

Cobhthach Cael Breagh, of dubious fame,
The ambitious, lies under thee.

"Side by side reclines that king
And Eocho Feidlech in his beauty;
And Eocho Airemh is there too,
In the north side, O Cruacha!

"The saint, upon his house being demolished,
Said unto him [Dathi], mysteriously,
That his grave [or his monument] here
Should not be illustrious, O Cruacha!

"There are fifty mounds around Cruachan's hill,
Upon the grassy sloping plain;
There are, of men and women,
Fifty buried in each mound".

After what I have already said on the probability of Torna's surviving his pupil Core,—who must have been alive after 430, at least,—there is no reason to think, as O'Flaherty does, that he did not survive King Dathi, who died in 428, nor that he had embraced the faith before writing this poem.

There is another very ancient poem on other interments at Cruachan (among which are mentioned those of several ancient poets of Connacht), preserved in the same old book, and ascribed to the Poet Dorban, of whose time I am ignorant. It is published, with a translation, among other curious pieces in Dr. Petrie's Essay on the Round Towers of Ireland.

We now pass from the reign of Niall, which terminated in the year 405, and of Dathi, his successor, which ended in the year 428, to that of Laeghairé, who succeeded Dathi, and in the fourth year of whose reign, that is, in 432, Saint Patrick arrived from Rome, upon his mission to convert our pagan ancestors to the Christian faith.

Poets, etc., of the Court of Laeghairé, at the coming of St. Patrick.

Saint Patrick found the country teeming with men distinguished for their acquirements in the native language and literature, if not in other languages; philosophers, poets, druids, judges, etc. On his first appearance at Tara, he found the poet Dubhthach installed there as the Monarch's chief Poet; and we have seen already that Ros and Fergus were also distinguished poets and scholars, learned in the laws and history of the country, as well as Dubhthach. We have also seen that Laeghairé had his Druids, who contended with Saint Patrick; and it appears that he had entrusted the education of his two daughters to the druids Mael and Coplait, even at such a distance from his court at Tara as his Palace of Cruachain, (in the present county of Roscommon). From all our ancient records we have abun-

The Druids
in the time of Laeghairé,
(A.D. 430.)

dant reason to believe that these as well as all the other druids, with whom the country abounded at this time, were men learned in the literature and poetry of the country as well as in druidism; and we have reason to believe that their druidic system was a more refined and a more philosophic one than that of their neighbours the Britons and Gauls. So, as these men as well as the poets were all active teachers to all comers, it is not to be wondered at that Saint Patrick found before him on his arrival many men among the people of Erin of cultivated mind, sharpened by study, capable of appreciating new ideas, and thus quick to recognize the sublime truths of Divine revelation in preference to the unsatisfactory mysteries and secret ceremonies of their ancient mythology, however venerable it had become in their eyes.

My object in dwelling so long on the learning and cultivation of the period of our history before the coming of Saint Patrick, is, to show upon authority that we were, even at that remote period, a nation not entirely without a native literature and a national cultivation, sufficient to sustain a system of society, and an internal political government so enlightened that, as our history proves, Christianity did not seek to subvert but rather endeavoured to unite with it; a system, moreover, which had sufficient vitality to remain in full force through all the vicissitudes of the country, even till many ages after the intrusion of the Anglo-Normans, in the twelfth century,—who themselves indeed found it so just and comprehensive that they adopted it in preference to the laws of the countries from which they came.

Having said so much on this important subject, let me now, with as much brevity as possible, adduce some proofs that although Erin adopted a new creed, whose preachers introduced a literature new perhaps, as well as splendid, and one which was cultivated with a fervour not often exceeded, still her own ancient language was not abandoned or neglected but rather even cherished and cultivated with more ardour, if possible, than ever. For it is certain that the ancient language and literature continued to be taught in all the schools and colleges, both lay and ecclesiastical; and that there never was a priest or bishop educated in Erin, from Saint Patrick's time down to the year 1600, who had not deeply studied the Gaelic literature and history, as part of his college course. And thus it is that so many of the most learned and wise ecclesiastics who have adorned the Catholic Church of Erin, and taught in its seminaries, have left us more memorials of their piety and wisdom in their native language, than even in the Latin itself; though the Latin tongue had in other countries

Cultivation
of the Gaelic language in the early ages of the Church in Erin.

LECT. IV. so generally usurped the literature of the Christian world for many ages, and though our native clergy were educated in that language also, as many historical facts might be quoted to prove.

The introduction of Christianity, and with it of the classical languages, did not supersede the cultivation of the Gaedhelic, then, but on the contrary it appears to have encouraged and promoted it. And this can be very clearly proved by the fact that several if not all our most eminent classical scholars and divines were also the greatest Gaedhelic scholars of whom we have any reliable account. From the long array of bright names among these venerable men I shall mention a few, of whose writings some pieces more or less numerous still remain.

Early Gaedhelic writers, after the introduction of Christianity.

The first distinguished writer in the native tongue,—after the three poets and scholars, Dubhthach, Ros, and Fergus, who were engaged on the Seanchas Mór,—was Fiacc, Bishop of Sleibhté (in the Queen's County), the first Bishop of Leinster. Saint Patrick, we are told, having made a journey from Tara into South Leinster, converted the people of that country, namely, the Ui Ceinnselaigh. Here he paid a visit to his distinguished convert Dubhthach, whom he requested to recommend to him, from among his pupils, a proper person to appoint as bishop over the newly-converted people; a man (he required him to be) without blemish of person, or stain of character, of easy circumstances, who had been the husband of but one wife, and to whom was born but one child. Dubhthach answered that he knew but one person who fully satisfied this description, namely, Fiacc, the son of Erc, who had shortly before gone into Connacht, with a poem to the kings of that province. "But", said Saint Patrick, as we are told, "even if he were here, would he consent?" And just then they perceived Fiacc coming towards them, on his return. Upon which Dubhthach said to the saint, "Pretend to cut off my hair". This the saint was preparing to do, just as Fiacc came up, and he said: "Why do you tonsure Dubhthach? thousands would feel his loss; why not take me?" Accordingly, Saint Patrick gave baptism and the tonsure to Fiacc; and so considerable was the young man's previous learning, that he is said (in the Tripartite Life of our saint) to have learned to read the Psalms (in Latin of course) in fifteen days, no inconsiderable feat of application.

Fiacc's Metrical Life of St Patrick.

Of the writings of Bishop Fiacc nothing is known, to me at least, to be now extant, but his metrical Life of Saint Patrick. This poem, which consists of thirty-four stanzas, or one hundred and thirty-six lines, is written in the most ancient style and idiom of the Gaedhelic, and in the ancient rhythm and measure called Cetal Noith, or the "illustrious narrative measure"; a term, I may remark, with which the Irish grammarians of the present day seem to be totally unacquainted.

LECT. IV.

[Fiac's Me-trial Life of St. Patrick.]

The narrative is, of course, short and simple. It recounts the saint's baptismal name,—the names and rank of his father and grandfather,—his captivity in Erin, —his passing over the Alps into Italy, for his education,—his return again to Erin, in the reign of Laeghairé MacNeill, to convert the descendants of Eber and Eremon,—how King Laeghairé's Druids foretold his success, and the destruction by him of the pagan system,—the founding of Dun-da-leathghlas (now Downpatrick) and of Armagh,—his last illness,—his receiving the communion from the hands of Bishop Tassach,—the wonders that happened at the time of his death,—and of his spirit passing “into the loving friendship of the Son of Mary”.

Much of learned discussion has been expended on a minor but still important point connected with this poem,—namely, whether France was not the country of Saint Patrick's birth,—by the late Dr. Lanigan, in his Irish Ecclesiastical History. Much ingenuity, too, has been expended upon it by those who have implicitly followed his authority, but pretend to make the doctor's case stronger, for the purpose of carrying themselves forward to new discoveries and to an ultimate dogmatic decision on this secondary point. Now it is somewhat remarkable, that writers who have pedantically crowded together heaps of irrelevant classical and French authorities on this secondary point, never thought of asking themselves, or that other people might ask them, a simple question as to what were the authorities to show that the poem was authentic at all; and yet this is a very important question, and has moreover been put by Dr. Petrie, in his Essay on Tara; but it is one which our modern antiquarians are far too patriotic or too confident to pretend to see. It is, however, a question that has occupied a great deal of the time of such mere Irishmen as myself for many years, and, with a result quite favourable to the character of this venerable poem, and its no less venerable ancient annotators, who have been so unjustly criticized by Dr. Lanigan and his followers, though none of them could read or understand either the poem or the annotations upon it.

I am, however, precluded from entering further here into the detailed discussion of this curious poem, by the circumstance that the Liber Hymnorum,—a manuscript more than a thousand years old, and which contains the oldest and most accurate copy of the poem now known to be extant,—is at present in course of publication by the Irish Archæological and Celtic Society; and I cannot here anticipate the conclusions which will

LECT. IV.

there, I hope, be satisfactorily elucidated. The second part of the Book of Hymns is already at press; and when it appears every student will be able to satisfy himself at full length upon the interesting subjects to which I have alluded.

Th. Ecclesiastical Schools of the early Christian period not exclusively Ecclesiastical.

After the introduction of Christianity into Erinn, the enthusiasm which marked its reception by the people, and more particularly by the more learned and better educated among them, gave to almost all the great schools a certain ecclesiastical character. The schools of the early saints were, however, by no means exclusively of this kind; but as the most learned men were precisely those who most actively applied themselves to the work of the Gospel, and as it had always been the habit of students to surround the dwelling of the most learned, to dwell near the chosen master, and thus (somewhat as in ancient Greece) to make for themselves a true Academy wherever a great master was to be found, so did the laity also as well as those intended for the sacred ministry gather in great numbers round the early saints, who were also the great teachers of history and general learning. And so, while from such academies naturally sprang hundreds of priests, saints, and religious, there also were the great bulk of the more comfortable portion of the lay population constantly educated. Every part of educated Europe has heard of the great University of Ardmacha, where so much as a third of the city was appropriated even to the exclusive use of foreign, but particularly of Saxon and British, students, so great was the concourse to its schools from all the neighbouring nations. Who has not read of the great schools, with their hundreds and their thousands of scholars, of Beannchoir [Bangor, county Down], under Saint Comgall and his successors; of Clonard, under Saint Finen; of Lothra, under Saint Ruadan; of Glas-Naoidhen [Glasnevin, near Dublin], under Saint Mobi; of Clonmacnois, under Saint Ciaran; of Tallaght, under Saint Maelruain, and the learned Aengus Ceilé Dé; of Birra [Birr] and Cluainferta [Clonfert], under Saint Brendan; of Roscrea, under Saint Cronan; of Iniscelltra, under Saint Caimín; of Killaloe, under Saint Flannan; of Mungaret [Mungret, near Limerick], under the holy Deacon Nessan; of Emiligh [Emly], under Saint Ailbhi, where the students were so numerous in the reign of Cathal MacFinguiné (about the year 740) that they were forced to live in huts in the neighbouring fields; of Saint Finnbarr's, in Cork; of the great lay school of Colman O'Cluasaigh, in the same place; of the great school of Cluain Uamha [Cloyne], under Saint Colman MacLenin, the converted poet; of Ross Ailithri, in the same county, under Saint Fachtna,— (I possess, myself, a copy of a most curious poem on universal geography written and of course taught in this great school by MacCoisé, one of its professors, about the year 900);—of Glenn-da-locha, under Saint Caeimhín [or Kevin]; of Tuam, under Saint Iarlaithe; of Swords, under the successors of Saint Colum Cille; of Monasterboice, under the successors of Saint Buite; of Tuam Dreacain, under Saint Brién; of Louth, under Saint Mochta; and of Kildare, under Saint Brigid, where Saint Finnen taught and preached before the foundation of Clonard by him.

While, however, these establishments, chiefly though not exclusively ecclesiastical, were under the vigilant supervision of the bishops of the Church, there were also at the same time a succession of great secular schools, from the time of the great meeting of Drom Ceata down to the sixteenth century, and which continued under the inspection of the most distinguished lay scholars in the country. The office of teacher in these truly National Schools was ably discharged in the latter times by various members of the families of O'Mulchonry, O'Higgin, O'Coffey, etc.

Secular National Schools, in the early Christian era, in Erin.

The meeting at Drom Ceata was the last great occasion on which the laws and general system of education were revised. It took place in the year 590, in the reign of that Aedh the son of Ainmiré, whose resistance to the impudent demands of the profession of poets, I had occasion to refer to in the last Lecture. Very soon after the refusal of the king to submit to the threats of satire on the part of the poets, and the consequences then supposed to follow from poetical incantations, he happened to be involved in two important political disputes. One of these was touching the case of Scanlan Mór, King of Ossory, who had been unjustly made a prisoner by the monarch some time before, and kept in long and cruel confinement; the other concerning the right to the tributes and military service of the Dalriadan Gaedhelic colony of Scotland, to which King Aedh laid a claim that was resisted by Aedan MacGabhrain, the king of that country. For the more ample discussion of these weighty matters, Aedh convened a meeting of the states of the nation at Drom-Ceata (a spot now called Daisy Hill, near Newtown-Limavady, in the modern county of Derry); which meeting took place, according to O'Donovan's Annals of the Four Masters, in the year 574.

The Feis of Drom Ceata,
A.D. 590.

This great meeting was attended by all the provincial kings, and by all the chiefs and nobles of the island: and Aedh invited over from Iona the great patron of his race, Saint Colum Cille, to have the benefit of his wise counsels in the discussion, not only concerning the special subjects for which the meeting was first intended, but many others of social and political importance. And so it happened that at this meeting the affairs of the poets and the profession of teaching were also discussed.

LECT. IV.

Revision of the National System of Education at
Drom Ceata.

It was solemnly resolved at this meeting that the general system of education should be revised, and placed upon a more solid and orderly foundation; and to this end the following scheme (according to Keting) was proposed and adopted. A special Ollamh, or Doctor in Literature, was assigned to the Monarch, as well as to each of the provincial kings, chiefs, and lords of territories; and to each Ollamh were assigned free lands, from his chief, and a grant of inviolability to his person, and sanctuary to his lands, from the monarch and men of Erin at large. They ordered also free common-lands, or endowments, to the Ollamhs, for the purposes of free education, in the manner of a University,—(such as Masraighé in Breifné, or Breifney,—Rath-Ceannaidh, in Meath, etc.),—in which education was gratuitously given to such of the men of Erin as desired to become learned in history or in such of the sciences as were then cultivated in the land.

Of the Chief
Poet Dallan Forgaill, (sixth century).

The chief Ollamh of Erin at this time was Eochaidh, the Poet Royal, who wrote the celebrated Elegy on the Death of Saint Colum Cille, and who is better known under the name of Dallan Forgaill; and to him the inauguration and direction of the new colleges were assigned. Eochaidh appointed presidents to the different provinces. To Meath he appointed Aedh (or Hugh), the poet; to Munster he appointed Urmael, the arch-poet and scholar; to Connacht he appointed Seanchan Mac Cuairfertaigh; to Ulster he appointed Ferfurb Mac Muiredhaigh; and so on.

It will have been observed that the endowed educational establishments placed under these masters were in fact National Literary Colleges, quite distinct from the great literary and Ecclesiastical schools and colleges which about this time, forming themselves round individual celebrity, began to cover the land, and whose hospitable halls were often (as we know) crowded with the sons of princes and nobles, and with tutors and pupils from all parts of Europe, coming over to seek knowledge in a country then believed to be the most advanced in the civilization of the age.

Laws concerning the profession of Teaching.

That secular education was constantly recognized as a part of the institutions of the country, and that it was sustained and protected by the laws of the land for centuries after as well as before the meeting of Drom Ceata, could be easily shown from the Brehon Laws,—revised, it is to be remembered, with the introduction of Christianity, and constantly in force during the early ages of the Church; for instance, in the following short but important passage, (MS. H. 3. 18, T.C.D., 438 a.), which I quote here because it shows the legal existence of a profession of teaching, and the legal provision for the remuneration and privileges of the teacher: LECT. IV.

“The poet (or tutor) commands his pupils. The man from whom education is received is free from the crimes of his pupils, if they be the children of natives [i.e., of the district], even though he feeds and clothes them, and that they pay him for their learning. He is free, even though it be a stranger he instructs, feeds, and clothes, provided it is not for pay but for God that he does it. If he feeds and instructs a stranger for pay, it is then he is accountable for his crimes”.

It appears, also, from the Brehon Laws, that the pupils were often the foster-children of the tutor. The sons of gentlemen were taught not only Literature, but Horsemanship, Chess, Swimming, and the use of Arms, chiefly casting the spear. Their daughters were taught Sewing, Cutting or fashioning, and Ornamentation, or Embroidery. The sons of the tenant-class were not taught horsemanship, nor did they wear the same clothes as the classes above them. Nature of Lay Instruction in the Schools of the early Christian period.

All this has, in the law, distinct reference to Public Schools, where the sons of the lower classes waited on the sons of the upper classes, and received certain benefits (in food, clothes, and instruction) from them in return. In fact the “sizarships” in our modern colleges appear to be a modified continuation of this ancient system. “Sizarships”, and “Poor Scholars”.

There is a very curious illustration of this custom in a short account of the reign of Finnachta “the Festive”, Monarch of Erin from A.D. 673 to 693. The story is preserved in an ancient vellum Irish manuscript, lately in the possession of Mr. William Monk Mason, in England; of which a duplicate version or copy is preserved in Duhal MacFirbiss’s Annals, in the Burgundian Library at Brussels. Saint Adamnan and King Finnachta “The Festive”.

Before Finnachta had come to the throne, he received an invitation from his sister to visit her. He set out with a cavalcade; and as they were riding in the direction of Clonard (I should think), in Meath, they came up to a young student who was trudging along the road, with a small cask or churn on his back. The youth, on hearing the tramp of the horses, made a hurried attempt to move off the road, but having struck his foot against a stone, he fell, breaking the cask to pieces, and spilling the milk with which it was filled. The cavalcade passed on at quick speed; and the student recovering himself, set out along with them, and notwithstanding their speed and his own grief, kept pace with them, with a fragment of the cask at his back; until at last he attracted the notice of the king, who smiled

LECT. IV.

[story of St.
Adamnan
and King
Finnachta]

when he saw the excitement under which he laboured. Then the king accosted him (continues the story), and said: "We will make thee happy again, for we have sympathy with the unfortunate and the powerless; thou shalt receive, O student!" said he, "satisfaction from me". And he continued to soothe the student in this way. The youth (who was afterwards no less a person than the great scholar and divine Saint Adamnan, the founder of the ancient church of Rath-Botha, or Raphoe, in Donegal, and afterwards Abbot of Iona), then spoke thus to the king, whom he did not know at the time: "O good man", said he, "I have cause to be grieved, for there are three noble students in one house, and there are three lads of us that wait upon them, and what we do is, one of us three goes round the neighbourhood to collect support for the other five, and it was my turn to do so this day; but what I had obtained for them has been lost, and, what is more unfortunate, the borrowed vessel has been broken, while I have not the means of paying for it". Finnachta kept his word with Adamnan, and it appears moreover that he kept his eye upon him afterwards; for after the conclusion of his studies and receiving holy orders, the king, seeing his wisdom and sanctity, took him to his court and appointed him to be his chief counsellor and director.

Here, then, we have a curious and a clear instance of the remote antiquity of the "poor scholar" system in Ireland. Here were six youths who came for their education to this famous school of Clonard [a school founded by Saint Finnen, who died A.D. 548], from some distant country or province, and who whether they paid for their education or not were supported by the bounty of the generous residents of the district. If they had not been, as well as many others, all strangers, like Adamnan (who came from Donegal), they would according to the system in force at this time have been either pensioners living freely at the college, or else they would be residing with their parents or friends in the town or surrounding district.

The house mentioned by Adamnan, in which they resided, could scarcely be the dwelling of any of the resident families, as it would be too much to suppose that any family could accommodate six or perhaps more such strangers at a time. However, whether such were the case or not, in the present instance we have abundant authority elsewhere to show that at and before and after the time of Adamnan (who died in the year 702), such in fact were the crowds of stranger students that flocked to some of our great schools of lay and ecclesiastical learning, that they were generally obliged to erect a village or villages of huts as near to the school as they conveniently could; and, as in Adamnan's case, to find subsistence in the contributions of the surrounding residents. LECT. IV.

Of this custom we find an interesting example also in an early anecdote of Saint Colum Cillé, in an ancient Irish Life of that saint, from which it appears that after having finished his preparatory course of education, under a local master in Donegal, he went to the same Saint Finnen, to Clonard, to enter upon his divinity studies, while that college was yet in its infancy. On his arrival, it is recorded that the young student asked Saint Finnen where he should erect his hut. "At the door of the church", said Saint Finnen; whereupon Colum Cillé went to a considerable distance off from the door, and fixed on a spot there. "You have not followed my directions", said Saint Finnen; "that spot is not at the door". "True", said Colum Cillé, "it is not, but the door will be at this place hereafter". And so it came to pass, says this old authority; for the school which at first was kept in the small church, in a short time after, from the literary fame and the sanctity of the founder, became so crowded as to include sometimes three thousand youths and adults, so as at last to require the extension of the establishment to the very spot at which Colum Cillé had set up his hut, as he had thus prophetically foretold.

Again, we find in the same Irish life, that Colum Cillé after some time left Clonard, and came to the select school of Saint Mobi of Glas-Naoidhen, (now the little town of Glasnevin, on the east bank of the river Tulchlaen, or Tolka, near Dublin). The number of divinity students at this school, at the time, was fifty; among whom were Cainnech (or Canice), the founder of Achridh Bo and of Kilkenny; Comgall, the founder of Bennchuir (Bangor, in Down); Ciaran, the founder of Clonmacnois, etc.

A curious story is recorded in this ancient Life. The huts of the pupils are stated to have been situated on the west side of the river. On a certain night, we are told, the church bell was rung for matins. There was a smart frost, and the river was frozen over, but Colum Cillé passed with his clothes through it; and then, continues our authority: "Bravely hast thou acted, O descendant of Niall", said Saint Mobi. "God is competent", said Colum, "to relieve us of this difficulty". And so, as we are told, it proved, that upon the return of the students from the church they found all the huts planted upon the east bank of the river, convenient to the church.

That these students' hut encampments were not confined to any particular province or locality, may be seen from the following facts found in a very ancient tract in the Leabhar Mór Duna-Doighré (commonly known as the Leabhar Breac), in the Royal Irish Academy. Cathal the son of Finginé, was

Students' hut encampments.

LECT. IV. King of Munster from the year 717 to the year 737, when he died. This prince was afflicted with the disease of a voracious unappeasable appetite, which he is stated to have got from eating some apples into which certain "druidical charms" had been conveyed by an Ulster scholar. And we are told that such was the violence of his voracity, that the king, who sometimes resided at Imluich Iobhair, [the ancient ecclesiastical city of Emly, in Tipperary], was accustomed frequently to wrap himself in a common gray cloak, and rush through "the huts of the students", (as the story calls them), with his drawn sword in his left hand, and to sweep away the cakes and fragments of bread from their tables.

Foreign Students at Armagh. Bede's allusion to Saxon and British students in Erin.

I have already alluded to the appropriation of one-third part of the great seat of education at Armagh to foreign students, especially those from the neighbouring Saxon nation. I may, perhaps, here quote what Bede (himself a British priest) says, concerning this period. (His death is recorded on the 26th of May, A.D. 736):

"In the year of our Lord's incarnation, 664", he says, "there happened an eclipse of the sun, on the 3rd of May, about ten o'clock in the morning. In the same year a sudden pestilence (called the "Yellow Plague") also depopulated the southern coasts of Britain, and afterwards extending into the province of the Northumbrians, ravaged the country far and near, and destroyed a great multitude of men. To which plague the aforesaid priest Tuda fell a victim, and was honourably buried in the monastery of Pegnaleth. This pestilence did no less harm in the island of Ireland. Many of the nobility and of the lower ranks of the English nation were there at that time, who in the days of the Bishops Finan and Colman forsaking their native island retired thither, either for the sake of divine studies, or of a more continent life; and some of them presently devoted themselves to the monastical life; others chose rather to apply themselves to study, going about from one master's cell to another. The Scots [that is, the Irish, then so called] willingly received them all, and took care to supply them with food, as also to furnish them with books to read, and their teaching gratis. Among these were Ethelhun and Egbert, two youths of great capacity, of the English nobility; the former of whom was brother to Ethelwin, a man no less beloved by God, who also afterwards went into Ireland to study, and having been well instructed returned into his own country, and being made bishop in the province of Lindsey, long governed that church worthily and creditably".<sup>(34)</sup>

<sup>(34)</sup> See Bede's Ecclesiastical History, chap. xxii.; (Bohn's edition, edited by Mr. Giles; p. 162).

It is ludicrous enough that even this very matter of fact tribute of truth paid by the venerable Bede to our nation was deemed by the latest English editor of Bede, (Mr. J. A. Giles, D.C.L.), too favourable an evidence of our early civilization, without some neutralizing comment. "The reader", says Mr. Giles, in a note, "who has heard much of the early civilization of Ireland will remember that the description given in the text applies to a period no earlier than the seventh century". As the vindication of the more ancient civilization of Ireland has not, however, much to fear from the remarks of this gentleman, I only allude to his observation here with a view to put students on their guard against similar expressions in English works, in which the subject of Irish history or antiquities may be alluded to. The truth is, that modern writers, not only in England but in Ireland, are very ignorant of our early history; and if ignorance or prejudice often prompts them to a sneer, let us Irishmen, on our side, answer it by making ourselves better acquainted with that history of which our critics are unwise enough to speak thus idly in the dark.

Some may imagine from much that has been said of our great ecclesiastical establishments in early times, that their course of instruction was merely classical, ecclesiastical, and biblical or theological; and that no secular sources of education then existed in the country. That such, however, was not the case, we have ample evidence in our old writings. The Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 645, record the death of Raghallach "the wicked", King of Connacht, who was ignominiously killed by a man named Maelbrighde, and a party of labourers, in a dispute about a stag which the king had pierced with a spear, but which, having run in amongst them, they killed and divided amongst themselves, refusing to restore the prey at the king's command. I have in my possession a copy of a very curious and important elegiac poem written on this king by Fionntain, the king's poet, at the royal palace of Cruachain. This poem records the more important events of the king's reign; and among the many other valuable facts and allusions preserved in it, we find that Cathal, who was the king's second son, was at this time pursuing his studies at the great school of Clonard; and that when he had heard of his father's death, he set out from Clonard, at the head of seven-and-twenty students of his own people, and came directly to the house of the regicide Maelbrighde, the son of Mothlachar; and attacking him with sixteen of his accomplices, he cut off his head and carried it, on the top of a holly stake, to the palace of Cruachan, where he Secular education in ancient Erin.

Of Fionntain, the poet of King Raghallach, (A.D. 645).

Education of Cathal, son of King Raghallach.

LECT. IV.

suddenly appeared with his trophy before his mother, in the midst of the astonished court. In this anecdote we have a very distinct instance of the use made even of the ecclesiastical schools by the young nobles of the laity.

Qualifications of a Fer-Leighinn, or Chief Master in a Public School.

It is to be remembered that the chief Professor or Master of every one of the divinity colleges was fully educated in the native as well as in the classical and foreign languages. For, to be a Fer-Leighinn, Drumchli, or Chief Master in a college or great school, the candidate was obliged by law to be master of the whole course of Gaedhelic literature, in prose and verse, (besides that of the Scriptures, "from the Ten Commandments up to the whole Bible"), as well as the learned languages, as already said. The legal arrangement of these great public schools was as follows:

The College Professors, (according to law), included:

Of the Professors, or Teachers, in a public School, or lay College.

1. The Caogdach, or "fifty-man"; who was the lowest, having only to chant the 150 Psalms.

2. The Foghlantidh, or scholar; who taught ten out of the twelve books of the college course of the Fochoiré, or native education.

3. The Staraidh, or historian; who had also besides history, thirty lessons of divinity in his course.

4. The Foircetlaidh, or lecturer; who professed grammar, orthography, criticism, enumeration, the courses of the year, and the courses of the sun and moon, (i. e. astronomy).

5. The Saoi Canoiné, or professor of divinity; who taught "the Canons and the Gospel of Jesus, that is, the Word of God, in the sacred place in which it is; that is, who taught the Catholic Canonical Wisdom".

6. The Drumchli, or chief head; a master who knew the whole course of learning, "from the greatest book, which is called Cuilmen, down to the smallest book, called the Ten Commandments, in which is properly arranged the good Testament which God prepared for Moses".

As a further proof that the native language and literature made no inconsiderable part of the divinity student's college course of education, there is scarcely one of our most eminent Irish ecclesiastics, from Saint Patrick in the fifth century down to the eighteenth, that was not distinguished for his knowledge of the Gaedhelic language and history.

I shall content myself by enumerating a short list of the names of those among these early ecclesiastics whose verses are quoted in the notes and commentaries on a single work, the Festology of Aengus Ceilé Dé, (or "the Culdee"), in the Leabhar Mór Duna Doighré, (or Leabhar Breac).

Saint Patrick himself in the fifth century; Saint Ciaran of Saighir, of the same period;—Saint Comgall of Bennchuir; Saint Colum Cille; Saint Ité the virgin, (of Cill Ité, in the county of Limerick); Saint Caeimhghin of Glenn-da-locha; Saint Ciaran of Chuainmacnois; Saint Molaisé of Daimhinis, in Lòch Erne; all of the sixth century:—Saint Mochuda of Lismore; Saint Moling of Saint Mullins, in Carlow; Saint Fechin of Fabhar (now Fore, in Westmeath); Saint Aireran “the wise”, of Clonard; all of the seventh century:—Saint Maelruan of Tamhlaght, (or Tallaght); Saint Adamnan of Rath Boith (Raphoe), and I Colum Cille, (Iona); and Saint Aengus “the Culdee” himself, of the eighth century.

LECT. IV.

List of early ecclesiastics distinguished as literary men, (from Aengus Cella Dé).

It is to be recollected that these are but names found among those quoted in the notes and commentaries on Aengus's work, which was written in the year 798. But if I were to swell the list from other available sources, it would occupy the greater part if not the whole of the space allotted for this Lecture. Now these writers were all Irish scholars and literary teachers, as well as eminent divines; and we may be certain that that which they were taught themselves, and the language in which they continued to write during their lives, they taught to their pupils again in like manner.

From the Poet Fionntain, we shall pass now to the celebrated Seanchan Torpeist, who flourished nearly at the same time, that is, about the year 600. Seanchan was by birth a native of Connacht, and by election chief poet of Erin. He was the pupil of Eochaidh Righ Eigeas (that is, Eochaidh “the king of the poets”), more popularly known as Dallan Forgaill, author of the celebrated poem on the death of Saint Colum Cille. On the death of Dallan, the chief provincial poets of Erin held a meeting at his residence in Breifné (Breifney), for the purpose of electing a successor to him; and their unanimous choice fell upon Seanchan, who, after his inauguration, was requested by them to pronounce an elegy over the body of their late lamented chief. To this request Seanchan assented; and the following is a literal translation of the short poem, as I have found it:

Of the Poet Seanchan Torpeist, (circa A.D. 600).

“Beloved the body that has fallen here!

Though a weighty man, he was a light man,

Light in body, weighty in followers:

Numerous were the schools of which he was the master

“Thrice fifty of us were his constant pupils,

Learned youths perfecting our knowledge.

And even though we had been more in number,

New learning he had to give us each day.

LECT. IV.

- “ The ocean’s caverns, which armies dare not,—
 The mighty cataract of the great Eas Ruadh;
 The rolling wave of a spring-tide’s flow,—
 Were the meet images of Dallan’s intellect.
 “ Until the shining sun is surmounted,
 Which God has created above all creation,
 No poet from north to south shall surpass
Eochaidh, the serene royal poet.
 “ He was sage, O God of Heaven!
 He was a noble and a chief poet;
 Until the wave of death swept placidly over him,
 Uch! he was beautiful, he was beloved”.

The only historical piece of Seanchan’s composition that I am acquainted with, is a poem of seven stanzas, or twenty-eight lines, which gives an account of the battles fought and won by the Monarch Rudhraidh, who reigned over Erin from the year of the world 4912 to the year of the world 4981, in which he died, according to the Annals of the Four Masters. This poem was evidently written for the descendants of Fergus, the grandson of Rudhraidh, who is mentioned in the first line of it, and who, in Seanchan’s time, had become possessed of large territories in Connacht and Munster, where they are now represented by the families of O’Ferrall and MacRannall (or Reynolds), in Longford and Leitrim; by the O’Conors in Kerry; and by the O’Conors, the O’Loughlins, and the O’Griobhthas (or Griffins), of Clare; the last-named clan rendered illustrious in our day by the name of the late distinguished writer Gerald Griffin.

The copy of this poem to which I refer is that preserved in the Book of Leinster, beginning:

- “ Fergus fought twenty battles;—
 It is to be remembered”.<sup>(35)</sup>

Edward O’Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 647, says that this poem gives an account of the battles of Fergus son of Rossa, grandson of Roderick the monarch; but this is an error, as the only mention of Fergus, in this poem, is what appears in the above lines, whereas his grandfather’s battles are given with the names of the places in which they were fought.

The Seanchan to whose poems I refer here was the same of whom is related the recovery of the celebrated tale of the Táin Bó Chuailgne, of which I gave an account on a former occasion. There is, however, another version of that account too interesting to be passed over in connection with him.

<sup>(35)</sup> original :—Ro fíe fergus fíeic cata,— bá cuimnigi.

In the very curious tale to which I now allude we are told that after Seanchan's election to the rank of chief Ollamh of Erin, and the formation on the usual scale of his household, his retinue, and his band of pupils, he consulted with them as to what king they should honour with their first or inaugural visit, according to ancient custom; and they agreed to pay their visit to Guairé surnamed "the hospitable", King of Connacht, who held his court alternately at Gort Insi Guairé (now Gort, in the county of Galway), and Durlas Muaidhé or Durlas Guairé, on the banks of the river Muaidhé, (now the Moy, in the county of Sligo). Seanchan, however, took with him but two-thirds of his establishment, consisting, indeed, of one hundred and fifty learned poets, and one hundred and fifty pupils, with a corresponding number of women, servants, dogs, etc. He and his company were joyfully received by King Guairé, and hospitably entertained (according to the story) for a year, a quarter, and a month.<sup>(36)</sup>

LECT. IV.
Story of Seanchan
and King Guairé "the hospitable".

At last Seanchan's followers became so troublesome at the court of King Guairé, that the king's brother, the saintly Mar.

<sup>(36)</sup> It is in the introduction to this story of Seanchan, that the very odd anecdote occurs illustrative of the bardic legend of the poet's power to rhyme to death vermin and the lower animals, alluded to in a curious paper read by the Rev. Dr. Todd before the Royal Irish Academy in 1853 (Jan. 23rd). The passage is substantially as follows:

It happened that during the poet's sojourn at Gort (says the story), his wife, Brigid, on one occasion sent him from her own table a portion of a certain favourite dish. Seanchan was not in his apartment when the servant arrived there; but the dish was left there, and the servant returned to her mistress. On his return he found a dish from his wife's table on his own; and, eagerly examining it, he was sadly disappointed at finding that it contained nothing but a few fragments of gnawed bones. Shortly after the same servant returned for the dish, and Seanchan asked what the contents had been. The maid explained it to him, and the poet eyed her with an angry look of suspicion. She at once protested her own innocence, and assured him that as no person could have entered the apartment from the time that she left until he returned to it, the dish must have been emptied by rats. The poet believed the girl's account, and vowed that he would make the rats pay for their depredations, and then he composed a metrical satire upon them. Of this we have but two and an half quatrains, of which the following is a literal translation:

"Rats, though sharp their snouts,
Are not powerful in battles;
I will bring death on the party [of them]
For having eaten Brigid's present.
"Small was the present she made us,
Its loss to her was not great;
Let her have payment from us in a poem,
Let her not refuse the poet's gratitude!
"You rats which are in the roof of the house Arise, all of you, and fall down".
* * * * *

And thereupon (we are told) ten rats fell dead on the floor from the roof of the house, in Seanchan's presence. And Seanchan said to them: It was not

LECT. IV.

bhan, a holy hermit, laid an obligation on them to depart, and engaged them to devote themselves to the discovery of the ancient tale of the Tain Bo Chuailgné, which had been long previously carried "eastward over the sea", as has been stated in a former Lecture. Seanchan was much grieved that the unreasonable conduct of some of his party should force him to leave Durlas under such unsatisfactory circumstances; however, go they should; and upon his departure the arch-poet presented the following short farewell poem to King Guairé:

"We depart from thee, O stainless Guairé!

We leave with thee our blessing;

A year, a quarter, and a month,

Have we sojourned with thee, O high-king!

"Three times fifty poets,—good and smooth,—

Three times fifty students in the poetic art,

Each with his servant and dog;

They were all fed in the one great house.

"Each man had his separate meal;

Each man had his separate bed;

We never arose at early morning,

Without contentions without calming.

"I declare to thee, O God!

Who canst the promise verify,

That should we return to our own land,

We shall visit thee again, O Guairé, though now we depart".

Account of the recovery
by Seanchan of the Tale of the Tain Bo
Chuailgné.

Seanchan then set out with his company in search of the tale of the Tain Bo Chuailgné, which they thought might be preserved in Scotland; but after visiting that country, and afterwards the Isle of Man, without success, he returned again to Erin, and repaired to Saint Caillin of Feenach, of Magh Rein, (in the county of Leitrim), who was the poet's brother on the mother's side, and to whom he complained of his difficulty. Saint Caillin and Seanchan then proceeded to Guairé's palace at Durlas, where they were well received; and the king having invited his brother, the holy hermit Marbhan, from his hermitage in Glenn-an-Seail, they held a consultation as to the most promising steps to be taken for the recovery of the lost tale of the Tain Bó Chuailgné.

you that should have been satirized, but the race of cats, and I will satirize them. And Seanchan then pronounced a satire, but not a deadly one, on the chief of the cats of Erin, who kept his residence in the cave of Knowth, near Slane, in the county of Meath, etc.

This ancient tale appears to have been the origin of the well-known practice of "rhyming rats to death", in Ireland, to which reference is so often made in the works of Shakespeare and other eminent writers of his day.

The wise Marbhan gave it as his opinion that the tale in its purity could at this time be received only from the lips of Fergus MacRoigh, who had been himself a chief actor in the cow-spoil of Cuailgne, and who, there was reason to believe, wrote the narrative of the expedition; and Marbhan proposed that they should call together the chief and most holy saints of Erin to fast, and pray to God that He would raise Fergus from the grave, to reveal to them this important ancient tale.

This counsel was adopted; and the saints who were called together were Saint Colum Cille; Saint Caillin; Saint Ciaran of Clonmacnois; and Saint Brendan of Clonfert. These repaired to the tomb of Fergus on the brink of Loch En (in the county of Roscommon); and, after fasting and praying, their petition was answered, for Fergus (we are told) did appear to them, and related the tale, which was written down by Saint Ciaran and Saint Caillin, on the spot; after which Fergus disappeared.

I have already given you the substance of this account of the recovery of the tale of the Tain Bo Chuailgne, in one of my early Lectures, but the present version is taken from an ancient tract entitled Imtheacht na Trom Daimhé,—(literally “the Adventures of the great company of Learned Men”). My copy of this tract is, I am sorry to say, but a modern and inaccurately transcribed one, nor do I know where an older can be found. This circumstance, however, does not affect the antiquity of the original composition of the tract, as I find in the Book of Leinster a satirical poem on this “great company” of Seanchan, written by Flann of Monasterboice, who died in the year 1056; and one in Cormac’s Glossary, which was compiled in the ninth century. I also find (under the word prull) a quotation from it of that part which describes Seanchan’s visit to Scotland, with a company of fifty learned men and fifty pupils.

The whole tale forms a very curious specimen of an ancient myth, poetically conceived, to account for the want of proof of the authorship of the celebrated Tale,—the history of the Irish Trojan war;—a tale already so ancient even in ages before the time of Flann and of Cormac, that the prosaic truth of its authorship was already lost in antiquity.

LECTURE V.

Delivered 9th June, 1857.]

(III.)—EDUCATION AND LITERATURE; (continued). Poems of Colman O'Cluasaigh, (vii. century). The "Liber Hymnorum". Of Cennfaeladh "the Learned". Of the School or College under St. Bricin, (vii. century). Of Ruman, "the Virgil of the Gaedhil". Of Aengus Ceile Dé. Of Fothadh "na Canoine". Of Flannagan, son of Ceallach, (ix. century). Story of the lady Blanaid, and Ferceirné the bard of Curoi Mac Dairé. Of Maelmuire of Fathan. Of the poetess Laitheog. Of Flann Mac Lonain. Topographical poem by Mac Liag. Poems by Mac Lonain. Of Cormac Mac Cullinan. Of learning in the x. and xi. centuries. Of Dallan Mac More. Of Cormac "an Eigeas". Of Cinaedh O'Hartagan. Of Cormac "Fili". Of Eochuidh O'Flinn. Of Eochuidh Eolach ("the learned") O'Ceirin.

FOLLOWING the order which I have prescribed to myself, the next distinguished writer who is to claim our attention is Colman O'Cluasaigh, the Fer-leighinn, or head master, of the great seminary of Saint Finnbarr, in Cork, who died about the year 666.

Poems of Colman
O'Cluasaigh, (vii. century).

Of the poetical compositions of O'Cluasaigh I know of but two specimens remaining. The first is a fragment of twelve lines of an Elegy written on his pupil Saint Cumain Foda (son of Fiachna, King of West Munster), who was Bishop of Clonfert, and died in the year 661. This fragment is given in the Annals of the Four Masters, who record the death of the author under the same year; but this date must be a mistake, as will appear presently.

The second piece by O'Cluasaigh is a Hymn, of twenty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and eight lines, which is preserved in the ancient "Liber Hymnorum", in the Trinity College Library. This is an important piece with respect to ecclesiastical if not general history, as it distinctly shows what the teaching of the ancient Catholic Church of Ireland was on the doctrine of the invocation of the saints; the same, from the very infancy of the faith, as it has unswervingly continued from that time to the present day.

The "Liber
Hymnorum".

The Liber Hymnorum,—a MS. written in a magnificent Irish hand, and splendidly illuminated—is now eleven or twelve hundred years old, and with its arguments or prefaces to each of the hymns contained in it, and the scholia with which it is thickly enriched, is certainly one of the most valuable ecclesiastical documents in Europe. It is deeply to be regretted, however, that we have but a fragment of the ancient book here in Ireland,—and that although there is another large fragment of it mouldering uselessly in the Irish College of Saint Isidore at Rome, we have as yet failed to procure even the loan of it here, where it might have been turned to the most important use.

LECT. V.

[Poems of O'Cluasaigh,
(vii. cent.)]

The argument of O'Cluasaigh's Hymn, which is, of course, as old at least as the book, declares that it was written by Colman Ua Chuasaigh, Head Master of Cork, “as a shield of protection” to himself and his pupils against the mortality called the Buidhechair, or Yellow Disease, which ravaged Erin and Britain in the time of Diarmaid and Blathmac. Diarmaid and Blathmac were the two sons of the monarch Aedh Slainé; and they reigned as joint sovereigns of Erin from A.D. 657 to 664, in which year they both died of this “Yellow Plague”. The hymn states, further, that it was in the year of their death that Colman wrote this poem. He wrote it, it is stated, on the eve of preparing to leave his college with his pupils, and repair to an island of the sea at no great distance from the land; the popular belief being that no plague, mortality,* or distemper could extend beyond the distance of nine “waves” from the land.

It is stated in the preface that some persons supposed that Colman wrote but the two first stanzas, and that his pupils wrote the other twenty-five, by two lines, or half a stanza, each,—which would show that the number of the pupils was fifty. This is curious, as supplying a fact analogous to what we have seen in a former Lecture,<sup>(37)</sup> as to Saint Mobi's school at Glas-Naoidhen, near Dublin, where Saint Colum Cille was one of “fifty” students who fled from an earlier visitation of the same dreadful mortality; and also as to the number of students attending an individual master, with respect to which, passing over other instances, we may likewise refer to the case of the poet Seanchan, who, on his visit to Scotland, was, according to Cor-mac's Glossary, attended by “fifty” lay students.

O'Cluasaigh's poem, consisting, as I have already stated, of twenty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and eight lines, begins as follows:

“The blessing of God come upon us;
May the Son of Mary screen us;
May He protect us this night,
Wherever we go,—though great our numbers”<sup>(38)</sup>

<sup>(37)</sup> Ante, p. 81.

<sup>(38)</sup> original:—Sén Dé donfé for bonté;
mac Maire rón félaosar;
fóerram dún innocht
Cia ciarra cain timaor.

LECT. V.

The writer then invokes the intercession of the Patriarchs, the Apostles, the Blessed Virgin Mary, Saint Joseph, Saint Stephen, and many other saints of the New Testament by name.

Another important feature in this poem is, that although the text is mainly Gaedhelic, it is interspersed with Latin lines and phrases, as for instance, the fifth stanza:—<sup>(39)</sup>

I should feel tempted to enter much more at length into the character and composition of this very ancient and authentic poem, were it not that it is now actually printed, with its arguments and glosses, and elucidated by learned notes by the Rev. Doctor Todd, in the second fasciculus of the Liber Hymnorum, shortly to be published by the Irish Archæological and Celtic Society.

Of Cennfaeladh "the Learned".

The next distinguished Gaedhelic and general scholar to whom I have to call your attention is Cennfaeladh "the learned", of whom mention has been already made in this, as well as in some of the former course of Lectures.<sup>(40)</sup>

Cennfaeladh was one of the most remarkable men of his age. His early life was devoted to military service; but, having received a dangerous wound in the head at the celebrated battle of Magh Rath—(now Moira, in the county of Down),—in the year 634,<sup>(41)</sup> he was carried from the field of battle to Armagh, to the Primate Senach, the representative and successor of Saint Patrick. The Primate had him conveyed immediately to Saint Bricin, the learned Abbot of Tuaim Dreacain—(now Toomregan, in the county of Cavan),—who appears to have combined high medical proficiency with his profound literary acquirements. Cennfaeladh remained under Saint Bricin's care for twelve months, until he was finally cured, but cured not without the loss of a part of his brain from the wound.

The School or College under S. Bricin, at Tuaim Dreacain, (vii. century).

Saint Bricin at this time, we are told, conducted a College, which consisted of three distinct Schools, in the town of Tuaim Dreacain; and these three schools were carried on in three distinct houses, situated at the converging points of three streets, and placed under the immediate superintendence of three distinct professors; namely, a professor of Feinechas or Brehon Law; a professor of Poetry and general Gaedhelic learning; and a professor of the Classics.

<sup>(39)</sup> in the original as follows:—

Regem regum rogamus,
In nostris sermonibus

Anac noe a luérlac
Diluvii temporibus.

<sup>(40)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, pp. 48, 418, etc.

<sup>(41)</sup> See Battle of Magh Rath, published by the Irish Archæological Society in 1842.

When Cennfaeladh became convalescent, he appears to have been in the habit of listening to the lectures and lessons communicated by Saint Bricin and his assistants to their pupils; and so clear and retentive had his mind become, that it is said to have retained everything which he had heard from all of them; so that we learn that he became himself afterwards the master of three similar schools.

LECT. V.
[Of Cennfaeladh.]

The passage in which this is recorded—(MS. H. 3. 18. T.C.D., fol. 399.)—is as follows:

“And the place in which he was cured was Tuaim Dregan, at the meeting of the three streets, between the houses of the three professors, i.e., the professor of Feinechas [Law], the professor of Poetry, [which included, in fact, Philosophy and general native Literature<sup>(42)</sup>], and the professor of Classics. And what was recited by the three schools, each day, he had [acquired] by the acuteness of his intellect, each night; and so much of it as he desired to show [or teach] he arranged in poetical order, and wrote into a white [or blank] book”.<sup>(43)</sup>

The “Three Schools”, spoken of in connection with Saint Bricin and Cennfaeladh, always, and even to a comparatively late period, formed the necessary parts of a lay College among the Gaedhils. So, in the middle of the fifteenth century, Diarmaid O’Clerigh,—the ancestor of the celebrated Michael,—and, after him, his son Tadhg Cam O’Clerigh,—acting in his capacity of hereditary chief Ollamh of the Cinel Conaill, (i.e., the race of the O’Donnells), in Donegal,—kept also Three Schools: for Literature, for History, and for Poetry. In this division, “Literature” would include the Latin and other literatures, apart from the Gaedhelic: while Seánchas, which is translated “History”, certainly included the study of the Feinechas or Brehon Law.

An interesting summary of the history of the O’Clerys (and in which this fact is stated) will be found in the Irish Penny Journal, for January 16th, 1841 (p. 226). It is given in connection with Kilbarron Castle, in the county of Donegal,—once the residence of this great family of scholars.

Cennfaeladh revised the ancient Gaedhelic grammars of Amergin and Ferceirtne, and was perhaps the first person to

<sup>(42)</sup> See note <sup>(2)</sup> p. 2; and Appendix, No. I., p. 461, to Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History.

<sup>(43)</sup> original:—Ocur ir ano do rugneo a leisir a Tuaim n’Dregain a compac na tui m’arob roir tuis na tui ruad .i. rai feinechais, ocur rai filioechta, ocur rai leisir. Ocur in neoch do canoir na tui r’gola gach lae do big aigirium tne seipe in mochtechta gach naroch, ocur in neoch ba hintairfenta leir de do beirio glunr’naiche filioechta rai, ocur po r’gubta aice he a caile libair.

L.ECT. V. lay the foundation of comparative philology in Erinn, afterwards cultivated by Cormac Mac Cullinan. He, too (unless we may attribute it to Cormac himself), was probably the original writer of the Grammatical Tract preserved in the Books of Lecain and Ballymote, of which some account was given in the last Lecture.

[Of Cennfaeladh.] Besides this grammar, Cennfaeladh compiled a Law Tract which is still extant, and which will make part of the publication of the Brehon Law Commissioners.

Cennfaeladh was also author of a well-known poem, of fourteen stanzas, or fifty-six lines, on the migrations of Golamh, or Milesius, from "Scythia" into Spain, and the subsequent expedition of his sons, with their Milesian colony, into Erinn, and their conquest of and permanent settlement in the country. This celebrated poem begins as follows:

"Golamh departed out of Scythia".<sup>(4)</sup>

Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 678, states that in an old manuscript, in the possession of Mr. William Monk Mason, the authorship of the ancient poem describing the internal arrangements of the Teach Midhechuarta, or Great Dining Hall, at Tara, was ascribed to Cennfaeladh; but, although there are two copies of this ancient and most curious poem still extant, one in the Book of Leinster and the other in the Yellow Book of Lecain, both in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin, (the latter of which, with an English translation, and with corrections from the former, is published in Dr. Petrie's Essay on the Hill of Tara), in neither of these books is the poem ascribed to Cennfaeladh.

There is, however, in the Book of Leinster, an extract of twenty-four lines, from a poem of Cennfaeladh. This poem is entitled Aidedhaibh Uladh, or the Deaths of the Ultonians; but I have never been able to discover any more of it than that extract; and from the character of that, the poem must have been a most valuable historical one, since it is evident that it contained a full description of the great achievements, the manner of death, and the places of sepulture of the series of the great Ultonian Champions of the "Royal Branch". The extract I allude to is introduced into a very ancient prose account of the death of Cuchulainn, the great Ulster champion of the Tain Bo Chuailgne. It gives the name of the spot in which he fell, and of the man who slew him, the number of the men he slew, and the monument of his head and hand at Tara, whither they had been carried from the field of battle. I feel perfect confidence in expressing my conviction that this extract is preserved in its original purity, and that it has not undergone the alteration of, perhaps, one single word, since it passed from the hand of its author.

<sup>(4)</sup> original:—Do luid Golamh ar in Scythia.

From Cennfaeladh, who died in the year 678, we pass now to Ruman, a native of Meath, who died in the year 742, and who is styled "the Virgil of the Gaedhil" by Aengus Ceilé Dé, in his pedigrees of the Irish saints. Ruman's writings are now, unfortunately, lost, or not known; but there is a notice of two or three poems of his preserved in an ancient manuscript in the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

After Ruman comes Aengus Ceilé Dé himself, a celebrated and saintly priest, and a great Gaedhelic scholar; the author of the celebrated Feliré, or Festology, and of the other important Irish compositions which I have so often spoken of in the course of my former Lectures. But I need not repeat what I then mentioned of his life, and of the position which he occupied in our literary history. Aengus Ceilé Dé died some time about the year 815.

Confining ourselves still to those of our distinguished men of learning who may be considered the representatives of the education of their time, the next great name in the succession would be that of Fothadh na Canoiné, of whom also I have already given some account in one of my former Lectures, when speaking of the reign of Aedh Oirdnuidhé, Monarch of Erin from A.D. 798 to 818.

Nearly contemporary with Fothadh, and after him, flourished Flannagan, the son of Ceallach, King of Bregia; who, as well as Fothadh, survived the Monarch Aedh Finnliath, who ruled from A.D. 861 to 877, in which year he died, at Druimines-clainn, in Louth, on the 20th day of November.

The Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 876, give two quotations from two poems written on this monarch's death, the one by Fothadh, and the other by Flannagan. The extract from Fothadh's poem consists of twelve lines, beginning:

"Five years over seven times ten,
Ten hundred and five thousand
From Adam, without falsehood,
To the death of Aedh are reckoned.

"Seventy over eight hundred
With six years, are reckoned,
From the birth of Christ, without reproach,
To the death of Aedh of Ailech".

The quotation from Flannagan's poem consists of twenty-four lines, beginning:

LECT. V.

Of Ruman,
"the Virgil of the Gaedhil".

Of Aengus
Ceilé Dé.

Of Fothadh
"na Canoiné".

Of Flannagan, son of Ceallach;
(ix. century.)

LECT. V.

[Of Flannagan.]

- " Long is the wintry night,
 With fierce gusts of wind,
 Under pressing grief we have to encounter it,
 Since the red-speared king of the noble house liveth not.
 " It is awful to observe
 The waves from the bottom heaving,
 To these may be compared
 All those who with us lament him".

The same Annals contain, at the year 890, a quotation from a poem by Flannagan, on the death of his son Ceallach, who was treacherously killed, in this year, by Fogartach the son of Tolorg. The quotation consists of the eight following lines:

- " This is Ceallach's servant coming from the west,
 Leading Ceallach's steed by hand;
 The dreadful news is cause of tears,
 It is no falsehood, the son of Dearbhail is dead!
 " No son of a king reigned over chiefs
 Nobler than Ceallach of the pure blushing face;
 A household nobler than the household of that man Exists not under Heaven of brilliant rays". [i. e. under the bright shining heaven.]

This is immediately followed by a quotation from Flann Mac Lonain, on the death of the three sons of Flannagan, (whom he calls Flann), including the above Ceallach; each of whom he surnames after the place of his residence.

This quotation consists of the eight following lines:

- " Illustrious three, the three sons of Flann,
 Who coursed over Odhbha;
Congalach of Colt; Ceallach of Cearna;
 And Cinaedh of Cnodhbha.
 " Though Ceallach for his faults may have been slain,
 It is a pity he should have fallen but in battle;
 Alas! that his fate was so premature
 That he has not lived the life of an historian".

MacLonain must have written these lines in the year 891, as we find that in that year Flannagan himself was killed by the Danes, at Olbha; and his son Cinaedh, who is mentioned in these lines, died at Dun Bric. Congalach, Flannagan's third son, died in the year 889.

Besides these quotations from lost poems of Flannagan, there is a perfect poem of his preserved in the fine old manuscript called the Leabhar Buidhé Lecain, (H. 2. 16, in the Library of Trinity College.) In this poem the author enumerates a few of the great historical tales which an Ollamh, such as himself, should be able to recite; after which he gives a long list of the deaths of persons eminent in Irish history, and the day of the week upon which each of them died, from the Monarch Conairé Mór down to Flannabhra, Lord of Gabhra, in Meath, who was killed in the year 876. LECT. V.

This poem is written in very ancient diction: it consists of twenty-eight stanzas, or one hundred and twelve lines, and begins:

“Let us relate the history of noble chiefs
Who bore over Erin illustrious sway,
Of Curoi who in the conflict fell,
Which was the tragic death of three.”<sup>(45)</sup>

The three whose tragical deaths are spoken of here were: Curoi Mac Dairé, (King of West Munster, at the period of the Incarnation, who was treacherously killed at his Court of Cathair Conroi, near Tralce, on account of his wife Blanait, by Cuchulainn, the great Ulster Champion),—the lady Blanait herself,—and Ferceirtne the poet. Story of the lady Blanait, and Ferceirtne—né the bard of Curoi Mac Dairé.

After the death of Curoi, Cuchulainn carried the lady Blanait with him into Ulster. Curoi’s faithful poet and harper, Ferceirtne, who had fled to the mountains of Kerry on his master’s death, soon bethought himself of taking vengeance of the woman who betrayed him. He accordingly set out for the north, and in due time arrived at Emania, the royal palace of Ulster, where he was joyfully received by his former mistress, Blanait, and her new husband, Cuchulainn. In a short time after Ferceirtne’s arrival at Emania, King Conor and the Ultonians held a great assembly at a place called Rinn Chinn Bearraidhe, on the brink of a high cliff. At this assembly, Ferceirtne took an opportunity of engaging the lady Blanait in conversation, during which he imperceptibly drew her to the brink of the precipice, when he suddenly clasped his arms around her, and flung himself with her over the cliff, where they were both killed: and this was the tragical death of “the three”; that is, of Curoi Mac Dairé, his faithless wife Blanait, and his faithful poet and harper Ferceirtne.

This is a valuable poem, bearing undoubted evidence of the remote antiquity of a great number of historic facts, as well as of many of our historic tales such as those of which I formerly gave an account.

After Fothadh-na-Canoine and Flannagan, we find in the same century several contemporary teachers, of whom the most Of Maolmuira of Fahan.

<sup>(45)</sup> original:—*innis récl réaltén nairic, oirpúic uar banba blotaic
Diangaet Cúruí ra gliaic Dianaig eét troga tpuair.*

LECT. V. distinguished was Maelmura, the priest, poet, and historian of Fahan Mura, in Ulster. He was the author of a celebrated poem in praise of Flann Sionna, Monarch of Erin from the year 877 to 914; and of a more celebrated and historically important poem, on the origin and migrations of the Milesians. The latter poem has been published, with the Irish version of Nennius, by the Irish Archaeological Society (for 1847).

Of the poet-ess Laitheog

In this century also flourished the poetess Laitheog, mother of the poet Flann Mac Lonain, already spoken of; but of her compositions one piece only has ever come under my notice. This is a short poem addressed by her to her son Flann, exhorting him to liberality and generosity, such as became a distinguished poet and scholar as he was: that he who received whatever he asked from others ought himself to be bountiful, keep a house of hospitality, and have a welcome for learned and all other guests. She advises him to write a poem, and go with it to the north, to the four brave and generous chiefs of Tirconnell, namely: Maeldoraidh [ancestor of the O'Muldorys]; Eigneachan [ancestor of the O'Donnells]; Flaithbheartach [ancestor of the O'Lavertys]; and Canannan [ancestor of the O'Canannans]: but she gives the preference to Eigneachan.

This curious poem consists of twelve stanzas, or forty-eight lines, beginning:

“Blessing upon thee, O Flann of Aidhné;

Receive from thy mother counsel;

Let not thy noble career be without hospitality,

Since to thee is granted whatever thou seekest.”<sup>(46)</sup>

This poem is quoted (and the poetess styled “the Nurse of the Learned”) in a poem written by Brian Ruadh Mac Conmidhé, in praise of Neachtan O'Donnell, chief of Tirconnell, who fell in battle in the year 1452.

Of Flann
Mac Lonain.

In this century also, as we have seen, flourished Flann Mac Lonain, who was a native of Aidhné, or South Connacht, and chief poet of all Erin. He was author of several poems still extant. Two of the existing poems were written for Lorcan, King of Munster, the grandfather of Brian Boromha; and a third, a description of the Palace of Ceann Coradh, at Cill-da-lua (Killaloe), in the days of Ceinneidigh, the son of Lorcan and father of Brian. These poems are described by Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 891; but I have, in my own

<sup>(46)</sup> original:—*Bennact opt a fionn aóne, Sab ó'o mátaip comáiple
na bí san gort ao' fñim glé Oip ir lac sac ní éunge.*

possession, copies of four other poems, attributed, in ancient manuscripts, to this author, which O'Reilly had not met. The first of these poems has a curious legend prefixed to it, by way of poetical preface to the topographical narration of which the piece consists.

L.F.C.T. V.

It happened (we are here told) that on one occasion the poet Mac Liag, who was the successor of Mac Lonain, went from his residence at Loch Riach, in the county of Galway, on a visit to King Brian Boromha, at Ceann Coradh, accompanied by his usual company of learned men and pupils, and attended by Ilbrechtach the harper, who had also been harper to his predecessor Mac Lonain. Their path lay over the high and dreary range of mountains, called Sliabh Echtgé, which separate the present counties of Clare and Galway. In the course of their journey they sat, to rest and refresh themselves, on the side of one of the numerous hills of the range, called Ceann Crochan, or Crochan Head. Here, as they looked out over the prospect, Mac Liag said: "Many a hill, and lake, and fastness, in this range; and it would be great topographical knowledge to know them all". Upon which Ilbrechtach the harper said: "If it were Mac Lonain that were here, he could name them all, and give the origin of their names besides". "Let this fellow be taken and hanged", said Mac Liag. The harper begged a respite till next morning, and he was granted it. When the morning came they saw the form of Mac Lonain coming towards them; and on his nearer approach he said: "Permit your victim to escape, and I will give you the name and origin of every remarkable locality in this range of Echtgé". His request was of course complied with; and thereupon he recited a poem of thirty-three stanzas, or one hundred and thirty-two lines, beginning:

Topographical poem by Mac Liag.

"Delightful, delightful, lofty Echtgé".<sup>(47)</sup>

The poet goes on then, in a vigorous and clear style, to give some account of the history of the mountain, and the tribes and warriors who in succession occupied it, made it their hunting ground, and left their names on some parts of it;—among whom he mentions Finn Mac Cumhaill, and his warriors. He then enumerates by name all the remarkable places; the hills, peaks, lakes, rivers, fords, woods, etc.; and he concludes with a vigorous eulogium on the Dalcassians of Clare, their munificence, and loftiness of soul, of which the poet gives a very curious specimen. He relates that, on one occasion, he met a Dalcassian at Magh Finé, in the county of Galway, who had just con-

<sup>(47)</sup> original:—Διπνιστο, διπνιστο, εὐεργιστο ἀπνο.

LECT. V. cluded a service of twelve months to a man of that county, from
 [Of Mac whom he received a cow and a cloak for his wages:—Having Lonain.] met the poet, on his way home, he addressed him in these words, as he tells us:

- “He said to me, in prudent words:
 ‘Sing to me the history of my country;
 ‘It is sweet to my soul to hear it’;—
 And the composition he instantly purchased.
 “Thereupon I sang for him the poem,
 Nor then did he show aught of loth;
 All that he had earned,—not mean or meagre,—
 To me he gave without deduction.
 “The upright Dalcassians heard of this;
 They received him with honour in their assembly;
 They gave to him—the noble race—
 Ten cows for every quarter of his own cow.
 “No dearth of raiment or food has been heard of,
 Upon the Dalcassians, or upon their king;
 That friendly race, as I well know,
 Are never without their sweet happiness”.

The poem is thus carried on to the end, as if composed and recited by Mac Lonain after his death. His death had been a violent one; for he had been killed, in the county of Clare, by a party of robbers from the county of Waterford; and he is made to mention this circumstance, and the names of the party, here.

This, as I have already said, is a very curious poem; but, unless Mac Liag is taken to have recited but a known poem of Mac Lonain, and to have introduced it in the picturesque way described, it is clear that it was written by Mac Liag himself; and if so, then probably at the suggestion, and from the reminiscences, of Ilbrechtach the harper, who must himself have been no ordinary personage to be selected as the constant companion of two such men as Mac Lonain and Mac Liag.

Poem by
Mac Lonain.

The second, hitherto unknown, poem of Mac Lonain, is a wild and romantic one too, as may be understood from the following prose legend, which is prefixed to it:

At a certain time that Mac Lonain and his company were passing through a desert place on these mountains, they were overtaken by a tempest, and detained so long that at last their stock of food was exhausted, and still the weather had not improved. While they were in the act of saying among themselves, that if they had food they would at least make an attempt to move notwithstanding the storm, they saw coming towards them a great, rude, burly clown, holding a fat cow by the tail with one hand, and a forester's axe in the other. The poet asked him if he were willing to sell the beef. He answered that he would not, but that he would barter it for a cow such as he himself should choose. Mac Lonain said that he would give him such a cow if he would but give time. The clown agreed to do so; but requested to be allowed to slaughter and cook the beef himself, a request that was gladly granted him. The cow was killed and cooked accordingly; and the poet and his company ate heartily and were satisfied, and they heaped gifts and presents on their benefactor.

[Of Mac Lonain.]

The clown, after this, departed; but at the end of a year he came to Mac Lonain's house, accompanied by four others like himself, each carrying a woodman's axe in his hand; and they were a rude, fierce, party of five men, (says the poet); and large was the space which they took up in the poet's house; and great and voracious was their feeding; and they beat and abused the women, and servants, and dogs, in and about the house; and they declared they should have nothing less than a cow which should never run dry, or to remain altogether in the house.

Mac Lonain then asked the chief of them his name: "I am Forester, the son of Entangled Forest", said he.

Mac Lonain then addresses Forester, in a poem of twenty-five stanzas (or one hundred lines), on the unreasonableness of his demand, the impossibility of complying with it, and the weight of himself and his companions on the establishment. In the course of the poem the author pays a handsome compliment to, and pronounces a benison on, the Dalcassians, men, women, children, and clergy, for their hospitality and liberality; from which it may, perhaps, be inferred, that the poet's difficulty with the fabled Forester, was an innocent hint to afford the Dalcassians another opportunity of indulging in their wonted munificence.

The authenticity of the poem is well attested by the fact that the author pays in it a particular compliment to Sida-an-Eich-Bhuidhé (that is, "Sida of the bay steed"), the chief of the Clann Cuilein, (the tribe-name of the Mac Namaras of Clare), and to his son Aisidhé, who must have been very young at the time; two well-known personages in the pedigree of the Mac Namaras, and who must have been both living, about the time of the poet's death, in the year 918.

The poet also bears evidence to the learning and literary labours, historical and critical, of his contemporary, Cormac Mac-Cullinan, King of Munster and Archbishop of Cashel; while he LECT. V. celebrates the valour and munificence of the reigning monarch, Flann Sinna.<sup>(48)</sup>

MacLonain's
 poem on the sons of Eoch- aidh Muigh- mheadhóin.

The third of these hitherto unnoticed poems is one of twelve stanzas, or forty-eight lines, in praise of the five sons of the Monarch Eochaidh Muighmheadhóin; namely, Brian, Fiacha, Fiachra, Ailill, and Niall ("of the Nine Hostages"). This rare poem begins:—

"The sons of Eochaidh,—high their renown".<sup>(46)</sup>

MacLonain's
 elegy on the death of Eig-
nechan, son of Dalach.

The fourth of these very rare poems of Mac Lonain, and one of curious historical value, is his elegy on the death of Eignechan, the son of Dalach, hereditary Prince of Tirconnell (now Donegal), and ancestor of the great O'Donnell sept of that ancient territory. The chief of Tirconnell died in the year 902; and on hearing of the sad event, from his servant, Mac Nageuach, the poet, who, it appears, was no stranger to his mansion and his hospitality, wrote these verses, consisting of sixty-four stanzas, or two hundred and fifty-six lines, which he sent forthwith to the north; and in them he dwells, with considerable minuteness, on his own reception in former times by the deceased chief, and on the various gifts and presents which he had received from him. From the nature of the presents thus described, and the circumstances under which they were given, and sometimes procured by the donor, this poem presents to us a very interesting glimpse of the mode of life at the court of Eignechan at the time.

The most curious part of this poem, however, very valuable as it is in a historic point of view, is that in which we are told that the chief found himself compelled to purchase peace and exemption from plunder and devastation for his territory from the "Danish pirates", who were at this time committing fearful depredations along the sea-board of the island. This peace and exemption were purchased by the chief consenting to the marriage of his three beautiful daughters,—Duibhlinn, Bebuadha, and Bebhim,—to three of the pirate commanders, whose names were Cathais, Turgeis, and Tor. After the marriage the pirates sailed away with their wives and their booty to Carraic Bra-craighé, in Inis Eoghain (now called Innishowen, in Donegal.) Here, however, the Lady Duibhlinn, who had been married to

<sup>(48)</sup> This curious poem begins:

Fíobadad mac fea nár-caig,

*Ourcaib congeib gleóó,
 traig luac a bó 'oó buóda,
 beparó a bó fa veóig.*

Forester, the son of the Entangled Wood,

Has taken upon him to make battle,—
 He will eat the value of his cow in food,
 And he must have his cow besides.

<sup>(49)</sup> original:—maicne echach, apo a n-glé.

the pirate chief Cathais, eloped from him while he lay asleep, taking with her a casket containing trinkets to the amount of one thousand ungas of gold; and she succeeded in safely making her escape to the house of Cathelan, son of Maelfab-haill, the chief of that district, who had been formerly her lover, and under whose guardianship she was the more ready to place herself. When the pirate awoke and found his bride and his casket gone, he flew in a rage to her father, and threatened to have his territory ravaged if he did not restore to him his casket. This Eignechan undertook to do; and he invited the Dane to come on a certain day, with his brother commanders, and all their immediate followers, to his court at Ceann Magháir, (in Donegal,) where the gold should be restored, and the company royally entertained. The Danes arrived, and were well entertained accordingly; after which the company retired to the lawn of the court, where stood a tree upon which the Tirconnellian warriors were accustomed to try their comparative strength and dexterity, and the metal and sharpness of their swords, by striking their mightiest strokes into its trunk. The company, by Eignechan's arrangement, sat in circles around this tree, for the usual purpose; the chiefs of both parties standing nearest to it. Eignechan then stood up to open the sports; and drawing his sword, he struck at the tree, but designedly missed it; and the weapon glancing off with immense force, struck his reputed son-in-law, the Dane Cathais, on the head, killing him on the spot. This was a preconcerted signal for the Tirconnellians, who instantly rushed on the rest of the band of their enemies, and quickly put them all to the sword.

The number of the Danes on this occasion may be inferred from the stated number of their ships, which was one hundred and twenty; and it is stated that not one of their crews escaped.

Eignechan then demanded and received the casket of gold from his daughter; and he gave it all away on the spot, in proper proportions, to the tribes and to the chief churches of his principality. Just, however, as he had concluded the distribution of the whole of the piratical spoil, Mac Lonain with his company of learned men and pupils happened to arrive on the lawn, on a professional visit to his patron. And here we have a characteristic trait of the manners of the times. When the chief saw the poet, and found himself with empty hands, he blushed, and was silent; but his generous people perceiving his confusion, immediately knew the cause, and came forward to a man, placing each his part of the gold in the hands of his chief. Eignechan's face brightened; he re-divided the gold, giving the poet a share of it proportionate with his rank and profession, LECT. V. and disposing of the remainder among those who had so generously relieved him from his embarrassment.

This curious poem contains very many other points of interest,—and amongst them Eignechan's pedigree. It begins as follows:—

“Fearful the news, O Mac na-g-Cuach,
Which thou hast brought us,—O sad fact!—
That Eignechan, the son of beloved Dalach,
Is buried beneath the heavy green earth”.<sup>(50)</sup>

I have now traced down the stream of learning, (more rapidly as I have approached the better known eras of our history), to a period from which O'Reilly and other writers have so far illustrated the Literary History of Erin that I shall only refer to a very few names more. Contemporary with Flann Mac Lonain was the celebrated Cormac MacCullinan, King of Munster and Archbishop of Cashel, who was killed in the year 903, at the battle of Bealach Mughna, fought by him against the Monarch Flann Sionna. Of Cormac's previous history some account has been given in a former Lecture;<sup>(51)</sup> and his connection with the eventful story of Queen Gormliath, Flann Sionna's daughter, will be remembered. Cormac's fame is, however, so very generally familiar, that I need do no more than recall here that he has always been regarded as one of the most distinguished scholars in Europe of his time. He was educated in the Church of Disert Diarmada, (now Castle Dermot, in the county of Kildare); and besides the knowledge which he is recorded to have acquired of the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, the British, the Saxon, the Danish, and other northern languages, he is regarded as having been one of the greatest Gaelic scholars that ever lived.

The tenth and eleventh centuries produced a very large number of men deeply versed in our native language and literature, as well as in the classical literature of the times. Of these, the space allotted to the present portion of our inquiry will permit me to give here but the names of a few, some portions of whose works, and whose dates, are given by Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, and a few more, whose precise time within this period I have not been able to ascertain, but whose names,

Of Cormac
Mac Cullinan.

Of learning
in the x.
and xi. centuries.

<sup>(50)</sup> original:—*Arvo do rgeál a mhic na g-Cuach,
Do mairt leat, is gníoth truaḡ, Eigneacán mac Dálair uil,
Do bual fó'n taltham trom ḡil.*

<sup>(51)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History.—Lect. vi.; p. 132.

as well as those of the others, and some parts of their works, are preserved in the Book of Leinster. Of these, I may particularly mention: LECT V

Dallan Mac More (who is not mentioned by O'Reilly), a poet of Leinster, who was attached to the Court of Cearbhall, the king of that province, at Naas, and the recorder of his patron's achievements. He appears to have been present at the battle of Magh Ailbhé, in which Cormac MacCullinan was killed, in the year 903. Of Dallan
Mac More.

And I should not pass over Cormac "an Eigeas", a poet who was attached to the celebrated Palace of Ailech, near Derry, the royal residence of the Kings of Ulster, and who was the author of a long poem commemorative of the expedition made by Muirchertach, son of Niall "Gluin-Dubh", about the year 940, into Leinster, Munster, and Connacht,—from which that prince returned home with the hostages of these provinces, all of which he placed in the hands of his father-in-law, the monarch. This poem has been published by the Irish Archæological Society, in the first volume of their publications; and it is now popularly known as the "Circuit of Mortogh of the Leather Cloaks". Of Cormac
"an Eigeas".

The next great name at this period is that of Cinaedh O'Hartagan, a distinguished poet and scholar, who died in the year 975; he was author of several poems, copies of which have come down to our times, and of which Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at this year, gives a description,—which is sometimes, however, incorrect. Of Cinaedh
O'Hartagan.

1st, A poem of twenty-eight stanzas, or one hundred and twelve lines, on the splendour of the Tech Midhechuarta, or Great Banqueting Hall, of Tara, in the time of Cormac Mac Art,—Monarch of Erin, in the third century,—and of the magnificence of that celebrated monarch's household appointments; beginning:

"World of perishable splendour".<sup>(52)</sup>

The oldest copy of this poem that I have seen, is preserved in the Book of Leinster; but it is there ascribed to Cormac Fili (Cormac "the Poet"), a writer with whose time I am unacquainted. Of Cormac
"Fili".

2nd, A poem of twenty-six stanzas, or ninety-six lines, on the origin of the name of Rath Essa, an ancient court in Meath. Eochaidh Airemh, Monarch of Erin about a century before the Incarnation, had a favourite daughter named Essa, to whom he offered her choice of any situation in his kingdom, for her residence; and she selected a spot south of Tara, from which she could see not only Tara, but Brugh-na-Boinné (the Palace of the

(52) original:—Dóthan buéam aluimoe.

LECT. V.
[Of Cinacdh
O'Ilartagan.]

Boyne), and Beinn Edair (the Hill of Howth). Here, therefore, her father built a court for her, which ever after bore the name of Rath Essa, or Essa's Court. This poem begins:

"She stood here to observe".<sup>(63)</sup>

This poem is preserved in the Dinnseanchas, in the Book of Ballymote; but with no author's name.

3rd, A poem of eighteen stanzas, or seventy-two lines, of the origin of Dumha Eirc, or Erc's Sepulchral Mound, and of the Hill of Acaill (now the Hill of Screen, near Tara, in Meath), beginning:

"Acaill near unto Tara".<sup>(64)</sup>

This poem is also found in the Dinnseanchas.

4th, A poem of thirteen stanzas, or fifty-two lines, on Brugh-Mic-an-Oig (the ancient Tuatha Dé Danann Palace, on the Boyne, near Slane), and several of the mounds and wonders of that extraordinary locality. This poem begins:

"Noble thy appearance, O plain of Mac-an-Og!"<sup>(65)</sup>

The oldest copy of this very curious poem that I know, is preserved in the ancient Leabhar na h-Uidhré, in the Royal Irish Academy.

5th, A poem of thirty-two stanzas, or one hundred and twenty-eight lines, on the origin of the name of Tara, beginning:

"It reflects credit on the women".<sup>(66)</sup>

The "credit reflected on the women", according to this poem, arose from the fact that the name Teamuir, (now, corruptly, Tara), comes of Tea, the name of King Eremon's wife, and Mur, a mound; and it means Tea's Sepulchral Mound, because she was buried on this hill, at her own special request.

6th, A poem of fourteen stanzas, or fifty-six lines, on the manner of the death and place of sepulture of each of the six sons of Aedh Slainé, Monarch of Erin, who was slain in the year 600. This curious poem begins:

"Oilioll repaired into Cailledh".<sup>(67)</sup>

7th, A poem of thirty-six stanzas, or one hundred and forty-four lines, on the manner and places of death of a great number of the warriors whose names occur in Irish history, chiefly Ultonians, from Conor Mac Nessa, King of Ulster, at the time of the Crucifixion, down to the Monarch Finnachta "the Festive", who was slain at Grellach Dollaigh, in Meath, in the year 693. This poem begins:

(63) original:—Deiró do munimair.

(64) original:—Acaill an áice Tempaí.

(65) original:—An rín, a mág, mic an Og.

(66) original:—Do beir mairi do na mnáib'.

(67) original:—Do luíó Oilioll i rín Chailledh.

“Champions who flourished at Emania;
 In the palace of Cruachain; at Tara;
 In Luachair, renowned for heroes;
 In Ailinn, in West Munster”.<sup>(58)</sup>

LECT. V.
 [Of Cinaedh
 O'Hartagan.]

Of this most rare and valuable poem, which O'Reilly had not seen, I am well acquainted with two authentic copies. One of these copies was made by myself in the year 1849, from an ancient vellum manuscript, now in the possession of a private gentleman in England. This copy consists of thirty-eight stanzas, or one hundred and fifty-two lines, interlined with most valuable notes and commentaries to all excepting the last four stanzas.

The second copy is preserved in the Book of Leinster, but without the interlined notes. This copy, in its present condition, consists of forty-seven stanzas, two of which are mutilated; the stanzas, from thirty-six to forty-six, both included, are interpolated, and bring the history down from the death of Finnachta in 693, to the great battle of Móin Mór in Munster, which took place in the year 1151. This battle was fought by Torlogh O'Conor, King of Connacht, and Dermot Mac Murrough, the infamous King of Leinster, with all their forces, against Torlogh O'Brien, King of Munster, and his Dalcassians; and seven thousand of the latter were slain in it.

It is noticed in the margin of the Book of Leinster, in the original hand, that these verses were added by Finn (Mac Gorman), Bishop of Kildare, who, we know, was the transcriber of a great part of this old volume, and who died in the year 1160. Still the two concluding stanzas are O'Hartagan's, and conclude, according to ancient usage, with the first word of the piece, to show that the poem is perfect.

8th, The next is a hitherto unknown poem of O'Hartagan's, which consists of eleven stanzas, or forty-four lines. Its subject is the pillow of Saint Buité, in his ancient church of Mainister Buité, in the county of Louth, (now incorrectly called Monaster-boice). The legend referred to in this poem is not sufficiently expressed in the text; but, as far as it is given, it contains a fair account of the cause and manner of the death of Conor Mac Nessa, King of Ulster, who had been struck in the head by the Connacht warrior Ceat, son of Magach, with the fatal ball which had been formed from the brain of Mesgedhra, King of Leinster, when he was killed by the great Ulster champion, Conall Cear-

(58) original:—Fianna bátaí in Emain,
1 Ráit Cruachán, in Temair,
1 Luachair, luaithe cupair,
1 no Ailinn, in ias-Munain.

LECT. V. nach, as has been related in a former Lecture.<sup>(59)</sup> But the part of the story which is not sufficiently explained in this poem is where the author calls this ball a stone,—saying that it lodged seven years in King Conor's skull,—that it fell out on the day of the Crucifixion,—and that this stone was afterwards the pillow upon which Saint Buite was accustomed to lay his head when taking his scanty sleep; and as such, the poet addresses to it these most curious verses, which are preserved in the Book of Leinster, and begin as follows:

“Thou, yonder stone, on which often lay
Buite the good, the son of Bronach the fair;
 Thou wert often a diadem in battle-fray,
 When lodged in the head of the brave MacNessa.<sup>(60)</sup>

9th, The last of O'Hartagan's poems which I feel called upon to mention, has also been unnoticed hitherto. It is one of seventeen stanzas, or sixty-eight lines, on the death of Niall “of the Nine Hostages”, and his sepulture at Ochun in Meath. This poem is preserved in the Book of Leinster, beginning:

“Behold the warrior-grave of Niall”.<sup>(61)</sup>

I think I need hardly call attention to the historical value of poems such as these, in which so many detailed references are to be found to some of the most interesting and important facts of our early history.

Of Eochaidh
O'Flinn.

After this Cinaedh O'Hartagan, the next celebrated Gaedhelic scholar on our list is Eochaidh O'Flinn, an eminent writer of historical poetry, who died in the year 984. Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at this year, gives a list of this author's poems, as found by him in various manuscripts, and describes them fairly enough; but he sometimes translates the opening line inaccurately.

The following are the poems ascribed to this author by O'Reilly:—

1st, A poem of fifty-six stanzas, or two hundred and twenty-four lines, interlined with a gloss, upon the invasion of Erin by Partholan;—giving an account of the place from which he first set out for Erin; the places he stopped at in his passage; the period at which he arrived in Erin; the chief persons that

<sup>(59)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 636. Appendix, No. CLVI.

<sup>(60)</sup> original :—a éloc tatl for é lair uair,
buite buain, mac brónaig báin,
Ropra minn an eiperra cōir,
Dia m-bá i cinn mic nerra náir.

<sup>(61)</sup> original :—Deáirb septa mēaig neill.

accompanied him in his expedition; the invasion of the Fomorians; the number of their ships and people; and the battle of Magh Itha, fought between them and Partholan's people. This poem begins: LECT V.
[Of Eochaidh
O'Flinn.]

"Partholan,—from whence came he".<sup>(62)</sup>

This poem is preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, in the Royal Irish Academy; and copies are to be found (but without the gloss), in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain; though in none of these three books is it ascribed to O'Flinn.

2nd, A poem, interlined with a gloss, containing twenty-six stanzas, or one hundred and four lines, on the Colonizations of Erin, first by the lady Ceasair, and again by Partholan; giving an account of the times in which both these colonies arrived in Erin; the number and names of the lakes and rivers discovered in Erin, in the time of Partholan; and the extinction of the entire colony. This poem begins:

"You learned men of Conn's beautiful even land".<sup>(63)</sup>

This copy is to be found in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions; and copies (without the gloss), in the Books of Leinster, Ballymote, and Lecain; in all of which it is ascribed to O'Flinn.

3rd, A poem of seven stanzas, or twenty-eight lines, upon the division of Erin between the four sons of Partholan, marking the places where the boundaries of each met. This poem begins:

"Four sons of Griffin-like voice".<sup>(64)</sup>

This poem is found in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, and in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain; but in neither of the two last is the author's name given.

4th, A poem of seventeen stanzas, or sixty-eight lines, giving the names of the Druids, artizans, farmers, etc., who accompanied Partholan to Erin. This poem begins:

"Good were the great family".<sup>(65)</sup>

This poem is found in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, under O'Flinn's name; and also in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, but with no author's name.

5th, A poem of fourteen stanzas, upon the destruction of Conaing's Tower, (on Torry Island, on the coast of Donegal), and the battles fought between the Fomorians and the Nemedians. This poem begins:

"The destruction of Conaing's tower by valour".<sup>(66)</sup>

<sup>(62)</sup> original:—partolan, can ar tainic.

<sup>(63)</sup> original:—a caema chláir chuinn coemfeing.

<sup>(64)</sup> original:—Ceatpar mac ba gribóda glór.

<sup>(65)</sup> original:—Ro bo maic an thuinnic mór.

<sup>(66)</sup> original:—toğail tuip Conaing co n-gail.

LECT. V.

[Of Eochaidh
O' Flinn.]

This poem is found in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, under O'Flinn's name; and in the Books of Leinster, Ballymote, and Lecain, but with no author's name given in those manuscripts.

6th, A poem of one hundred and ninety-six lines, interlined with a gloss. In this poem O'Flinn mentions the creation of Adam, and the time which elapsed from that era to the time at which the lady Ceasair is said to have landed in Erin; the number of years that expired between the universal deluge and the colonization of Erin by Partholan; and the interval between the destruction of Partholan's colony, by the plague, and the arrival of Nemedh. He then gives an account of the Nemedian colony; of their coming from Scythia, and their passage to Erin; and recounts the number of their ships, and the names of their leaders. The transactions of the Nemedians after their landing in Erin are then related; such as the clearing of several plains by cutting down the timber, with which the country was overgrown; the discovery and bursting forth of lakes and rivers; the hardships the Nemedians suffered from the Fomorians; the battles they fought with them; and the destruction of Conaing's Tower; the return of part of the colony to Greece; and the retirement of another portion of it into Britain, under their chief, Britan Mael, from whom that country is said to have derived its name. This poem begins:

"Great Erin, made illustrious by the Gaedhil".<sup>(67)</sup>

This poem is preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, under O'Flinn's name; and in the Books of Leinster, Ballymote, and Lecain; but in these with no author's name.

7th, A poem of eighteen stanzas, or seventy-two lines, giving an account of the Invasion of Erin by the Tuatha Dé Danann, who were the descendants of another son of the above Nemedh, who passed out of Erin after the destruction of Conaing's Tower. This branch of the Nemedians, according to the poem, seated themselves in the northern islands of Greece, and now returned under the above name. The poem recounts their subsequent travels through the north of Europe; their battles; their proficiency in magic and other sciences; the names of their chief men, women, poets, poetesses, doctors, druids, artificers, etc.; the magical or talismanic articles that they brought with them into Erin, namely,—the Lia Fáil, or Stone of Destiny, as it is generally called by Latin and English writers, on which the Monarchs of Erin were anciently crowned at Tara; the wonderful spear of the champion Lug; and the gifted caldron of their King, the Daghada Mór; their manner of coming into Erinn; their battle with, and overthrow of, the Firbolgs, at Magh Tuiredh; the institution of the public games at Tailltén in Meath, on the first day of August in each year; and many other curious things. This valuable poem begins:

(67) original:—Eipe oll oíronc Gaedhil.

"Erinn the proud and the warlike".<sup>(68)</sup>

This poem is preserved, with an interlined gloss, in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions; but the copy there contains but fifteen stanzas; and there are full copies in the Books of Leinster, Ballymote, and Lecain; in all of which O'Flinn is set down as the author.

8th, A poem of seventeen stanzas, or sixty-eight lines, giving the names of the principal leaders that came with the sons of Milesius into Erinn, and also the names of the places where several of them died. This poem is preserved in the Books of Leinster and Lecain, in both of which its authorship is ascribed to O'Flinn. It begins:

"The chiefs of the expedition from beyond the sea".<sup>(69)</sup>

9th, A poem of eighteen stanzas, or seventy-two lines, on the accession of the brothers Sobhaircé and Cermna (of the Irian race), to the government of Erinn, about fifteen hundred years before the Incarnation, according to the chronology of the Annals of the Four Masters; the partition of the island between them, by a line drawn from Inbher Colpa (the mouth of the River Boinn), to Limerick; the Rathes or Courts erected by them, particularly those of Dun-Sobhaircé (now Dunseverick, in the county of Antrim), and Dun-Cearmna (on what is now called the Old Head of Kinsale, in the county of Cork). This poem begins:

"Dun Sobhaircé of the numerous host".<sup>(70)</sup>

It is preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, with an interlined gloss, and under O'Flinn's name; and in the Book of Lecain, without either gloss or author's name.

10th, A poem of eighty-two stanzas, or three hundred and twenty-eight lines, giving an account of the coming of the Gælians or Milesians into Erinn, "at the time that the Greeks held the sovereignty of the world"; and an account of all the invasions of Erinn, from beginning to end; but particularly that of the sons of Milesius of Spain. This poem begins:

"Let the sons of delightful wisdom listen".<sup>(71)</sup>

Copies of this important poem are preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, with an interlined gloss; and in the Books

(68) original:—Eirne co n-uail co n-fothaisb.

(69) original:—Toirig na loingri tar leas.

(70) original:—Dun Sobhairce diai rluas linn.

(71) original:—Eirteab aer egnai sibinn.

LECT. V. of Ballymote and Lecain, without the gloss, and less perfect, but under the name of O'Flinn in all.
 [Of Eochaidh O'Flinn.]

11th, A poem of twenty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and eight lines, giving an account of the building of the Palace of Emania in Ulster, by Queen Macha and her husband Cimbaeth (six hundred and forty-five years before the Incarnation, according to the chronology of the Annals of the Four Masters); the kings that ruled there from the time of Cimbaeth to the reign of Conor Mac Nessa (contemporary with our Lord); and from the death of Conor to the destruction of Emania by the three Collas (immediately after the battle of Achadh-leith-dearg, in which they defeated and slew Fergus Fogha, King of Ulster, A.D. 331). It also gives the names of the provincial Kings of Ulster who became Monarchs of Erin. This poem begins:

"O delightful Emania of the spears".<sup>(72)</sup>

This poem is preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, with an interlined gloss, and in the Book of Lecain (but there without the gloss), in both of which it is ascribed to O'Flinn. It is also preserved in the Book of Leinster, without gloss or author's name.

12th, A poem of eighteen stanzas, which gives the names of the fifteen kings that reigned over the province of Ulster, from the time of Cimbaeth to that of Concobar Mac Nessa, and the number of years that each king reigned there, from the time of Concobar Mac Nessa to the destruction of that palace by the three Collas. This poem, which appears to be a supplement to the last described, begins:

"Cimbaeth, the chief of the young warriors of Emania".<sup>(73)</sup>

Copies of this poem are preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of Invasions, the Book of Lecain, and the Book of Leinster, but without any author's name; there can, however, be little doubt that it was written by O'Flinn.

13th, A poem of sixteen stanzas, on the reign of the Monarch Ugainé Mór, who is stated to have extended his rule over the whole of the West of Europe, as far as the Mediterranean Sea. Ugainé had to wife Ceasair, the daughter of the King of France; by whom he had twenty-two sons and three daughters, among whom he divided Erin into twenty-five parts; and it is these divisions and their names, and the names of Ugainé's children, that form the principal subject of this poem, which begins:

"Ugainé the proud and illustrious".<sup>(74)</sup>

Copies of this poem are preserved in the O'Clerys' Book of (72) original:—A Emain rónac aibinn.

(73) original:—Cimbaeth cleithe n-óc n Emna.

(74) original:—Ugoine uallac ampa.

Invasions, the Book of Lecain, and the Book of Leinster; all of which give O'Flinn as the author. LECT. V.
[Of Eochaidh O'Flinn.]

14th, A poem of fifty-eight stanzas, on the creation of the world; the names and ages of the patriarchs who lived before the deluge; the building and dimensions of Noah's Ark; the deaths of Noah and his sons; the building of the Tower of Babel; the confusion of languages; and the settlement in Egypt of Niul, son of Fenius Farsaidh, ancestor of the Milesians. This poem begins:

"The Lord of Heaven is the Father of all men,
The gracious Son of Mary the Virgin,
Our chief, our safety, our head,
Without beginning, without limit, without end".<sup>(75)</sup>

There is a fine copy of this poem preserved in the Book of Lecain, but no author's name. Edward O'Reilly, however, in his Irish Writers, ascribes it to O'Flinn.

"There is", says Edward O'Reilly, "another poem that by some persons is attributed to this author, beginning: 'The king of lakes is this southern lake'.<sup>(76)</sup> But it is by others, perhaps more properly, ascribed to Flann of Buité. It is to be found in the Dinnseanchas".

O'Reilly, and those who with him attributed this poem either to Eochaidh O'Flinn, or Flann of Monasterboice, are, however, entirely wrong; as it now clearly appears that neither of them was the author. And not only were O'Reilly and those other persons to whose opinions he refers, wrong, but even the generally accurate and cautious Keating, who ascribes it to O'Flinn, was also mistaken. In the concluding stanza of several of the poems just described, Eochaidh O'Flinn avows himself as the author; but in the present poem, (which is one giving an account of the origin of the name of Loch Carman, now the Harbour of Wexford), the poet concludes by stating that Eochaidh Eolach, or "the Learned", wrote this poem. Now, this is a distinction that we never find given to O'Flinn, though I believe he was equally deserving of it; nor was there any Eochaidh of the tenth or eleventh century, who bore this distinction, but Eochaidh "the Learned" O'Ceirin, who was the contemporary of Flann of Monasterboice, who died in the year 1056. Eochaidh Eolach, (or "the learned") O'Ceirin.

The compiler or transcriber of the ancient Leabhar na h-Uidhré, who died in the year 1106, states that the curious

<sup>(75)</sup> original:—*Achar chaithe coimig nite,
Mac maith muirne ingine,
Ar cuingró, ar coimig, ar cenn,
Cen tur, cen cnuich, cen foircenn.*

<sup>(76)</sup> original:—Rig na Loch in lochra tóar.

LECT. V. Tract on the ancient Pagan Cemeteries of Erinn, preserved in that valuable book, had been compiled and collected by Eochaidh "the Learned" O'Ceirin, and by Flann, from the Books of Eochaidh O'Flannagan, at Armagh, the Books of Monasterboice, and other choice books besides. There can, then, be no doubt that this Eochaidh "the Learned" O'Ceirin was the author of this poem on Loch Carman.
 [Of Eochaidh O'Flinn.]

It was from this poem that Dr. Keating took the extract, of three stanzas, on the triennial holding of the Great Feast of Tara, as given in a former Lecture;<sup>(77)</sup> and it is on this occasion that he ascribes the poem to Eochaidh O'Flinn, in place of Eochaidh O'Ceirin, the true author, of whom I shall have occasion to speak more hereafter.

<sup>(77)</sup> See ante, p. 12; [and see same in Keating, (edition by John O'Mahony, New York, 1857;) p. 232.]

LECTURE VI.

[Delivered 16th June, 1857.]

(III.) EDUCATION, AND LITERATURE; (continued). Of Mac Liag, and his works [circa A.D. 1000]. The History of the "Wars of the Danes". Life of Brian Boromha; by Mac Liag. Poems by Mac Liag. Of Poems of this writer not described by O'Reilly. Of the history of Carn Connail. Of Mac Coisé, and his Poems. Of a prose piece by Mac Coisé. Of the Tale of the "Plunder of the Castle of Maclmilscothach".

WE come now to Mac Liag, the chief historical Poet of Erin, in his time, who died in the year 1015. This remarkable man was a native of South Connacht, and had in his early professional career been attached to the court of Tadhg O'Kelly, the hereditary prince of Ui Mainé, an extensive territory of south-eastern Connacht, bordering on the River Shannon; (a chieftain whose family is now represented in direct line of descent, by my esteemed friend, Denis Henry Kelly, Esq., of Castle Kelly, in the county of Roscommon).

On the death of Mahon, King of Munster, the elder brother of Brian Boromha, in the year 974, he was succeeded by the immortal Brian himself, who was then in the forty-eighth year of his age, having been born in the year 925.

Whether it was on his accession to the throne of Munster, in the year 974, or to the throne of all Erin, in the year 1002, that Mac Liag became attached to Brian, I am not able to say; but I believe it was at the latter period, and that it was then also that Brian raised him to the chair of the monarch's Ollamh, or chief Poet of Erin, after which he lived in the monarch's residence of Ceann Coradh (at Killaloe, in the present county of Clare).<sup>(78)</sup>

Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 1015, gives a list of seven pieces, prose and verse, which he ascribes to Mac Liag. Of Mac Liag (circa A.D.
1000) and his
works.

<sup>(78)</sup> It is to be remembered that no monarch of Erin held his residence at Tara, the ancient seat of the monarchy, ever since the death of Diarmait, the son of Fergus Cerrbheoil, in the year 558, in whose reign the hill and palace were cursed by Saint Ruadan of Lothra (in Ormond); so that, after the desertion of the ancient city, the monarch, of whichever of the different native families he happened to be a member, fixed his residence wherever he pleased, but generally if not invariably within his immediate provincial territory. And it was so with Brian, who fixed his residence on the plain of Killaloe, in the immediate neighbourhood of his own ancestral residence of Grianan Lachtra,—the ruins of which are still to be seen, on the south shoulder of the Hill of Craig Liath, about a mile north-west of Killaloe.

LECT. VI.

[Of Mac Liag.]

1st,—A book of the History and Annals of the wars and battles of Erin; but which, notwithstanding its title, was, he says, confined to an account of the battles of Munster during the time of Brian Boromha. O'Reilly says that he had a copy of this book in his own possession, made by John Mac Solly, of Stackallen in the county of Meath, in the year 1710. Now, it happens that this identical book is at present in the Royal Irish Academy, (under the class-mark of 13. 5, in the original collection of the Academy); but the book of the Wars of Munster, of which O'Reilly speaks, forms but a single tract, making but fourteen pages of the volume; and there is not a word in it to show that this tract was compiled by Mac Liag. Indeed, on the contrary, there is internal evidence to show that it was written long after Mac Liag's death, and that it is no more than a well-known popular abstract of the Battle of Clontarf, taken chiefly from the more important tract known as the "Wars of the Danes and Gaedhil", of which so much has been said in the course of my former Lectures.<sup>(79)</sup>

The History
of the "Wars
of the Danes".

Mac Liag, then, was certainly not the compiler of the particular tract which O'Reilly without any authority ascribes to him. It is not, however, so certain that he was not the author of the more important tract of the "Wars of the Danes" itself, in which the career of his great patron Brian is so faithfully and so copiously recorded, and in which the terrible battle of Clontarf, where the power of the Danish invaders was for ever annihilated, is described in such graphic and minute detail that even some Danish words spoken on the battle-field are preserved in it. We know indeed from Mac Liag himself, that he was not present at the battle of Clontarf; but we know that his intimate friend, and fellow-poet and historian, Errard Mac Coisé, of whom we shall presently have to speak, was present in the train of the treacherous Malachy, King of Meath; and we also know that Mac Liag actually received from Mac Coisé a detailed account of the battle, a fact which is to be learned from a poem which I shall have presently to describe. We may suppose, then, that Mac Liag had this tract on the Wars of the Danes written, from the first coming in of the Danes, down to the battle of Clontarf; and that, not having been himself present at that battle, he sought from Mac Coisé the details of it, which the latter, as an eye-witness of the scene, must have been so capable of furnishing to him.

Mac Liag's Life of Brian Boromha.

2nd,—The second piece attributed to Mac Liag, described by O'Reilly, was a Life of Brian Boromha; an extract from which, he states, had been given by General Vallancey, in the first edition of his Irish Grammar. Of this Life of Brian Boromha, I have never been able to see, or ascertain the existence of, any entire copy; but fortunately a very small fragment (the very last leaf of it) remains in the well known hand of the last great Irish scholar, Dubhaltach Mac Fírbisigh; and this copy must have been written by him before the year 1650, as he changed the character of his handwriting in or about that year. This single small leaf, which was discovered by me some years ago, was merely laid in between two folios of the Leubhar Buidhe Lecain (H. 2. 16, T.C.D.). But although this is an old piece of composition, it is quite certain, I think, that it could not have been written by Mac Liag. Indeed, from this little fragment, it would appear to have been a later semi-religious life of the great warrior,—something more in the nature of a sermon on his life and death than a historical biography. This is, however, but a mere inference from the little that remains of it.

(79) See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 232.

3rd,—The third piece described by O'Reilly, and attributed by him to Mac Liag, is a poem of forty stanzas, or one hundred and sixty lines, giving the names of the twelve sons of Cas, (from whom the Dalcassians of Thomond derive their tribe designation), and the different families which descended from each, down to the sons of Brian Boromha, in whose time the poem was evidently written. This poem begins:

"Twelve sons that sprung from Cas".<sup>(80)</sup>

It is more than probable that Mac Liag was the author of this poem; but though there are copies of it preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, they are not accompanied by any author's name; nor does O'Reilly give any authority for his statement.

4th,—The fourth piece of Mac Liag's, described by O'Reilly, is a poem of eight stanzas, giving the names of the twelve sons of Ceineidigh (Kennedy), the father of Brian Boromha, and the manner of the death of each. This poem begins:

"The twelve sons of brave Ceineidigh".<sup>(81)</sup>

There are copies of this poem preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain. It is in the latter only that it is ascribed to Mac Liag.

5th,—The fifth piece of Mac Liag's, described by O'Reilly, is a poem of eleven stanzas, written on the fall of Brian Boromha, with his eldest son Murchadh, and the flower of the warriors of Munster and Connacht, at the battle of Clontarf, in the year 1014; and on the consequent desolate state of the fallen monarch's palace at Ceann Coradh. This poem begins:

<sup>(80)</sup> original:—Da thac d'ég do éinn ó Char.

<sup>(81)</sup> original:—Dá thac d'ég Ceineioig éarig.

LECT. VI.

[Of Mac Liag.]

“ O Ceann Coradh! where is Brian?

Or where is the splendour that was upon thee?

Where are the nobles and the sons of kings,
With whom we drank wine in thy halls?<sup>(82)</sup>

The concluding stanza of this plaintive poem shows plainly enough who the author was. It runs as follows:

“ Woe that I live after Brian!

I am Mac Liag from the lake:

To invite me into his treasury,

He would come an hundred times, O Ceann Coradh!<sup>(83)</sup>

An imperfect copy of this poem, with an English translation, was published by my late lamented friend, James Hardiman, in his Irish Minstrelsy; and a full versification of it, by the late James Clarence Mangan, from a literal prose translation of mine, was published in the Irish Penny Journal, No. 28 (Saturday, January 9, 1841).

6th.—The sixth piece attributed to Mac Liag by O'Reilly, but which he does not describe, and of the first line of which he gives an incorrect version in text and translation, is a poem of twenty-six stanzas, beginning:

“ From the east has come the news of Brian's fall,

Alas! that I am in this world after him;

Thou messenger, who comest from the east,

Tell me, has Murchadh been slain too?<sup>(84)</sup>

The messenger here addressed by Mac Liag was Urard, Errard, or Errad Mac Coisé, poet and historian to Maelseachlainn, or Malachy the Second, King of Meath.

Malachy, with a thousand of the chosen warriors of Meath, marched to Clontarf along with Brian to aid him; but when the battle commenced, he and his division fell out of the ranks, and remained idle spectators of the bloody fight till its termination. Mac Coisé the poet, who accompanied his patron on the occasion, had the best possible opportunity of witnessing the details of the battle; and as his person was held sacred and inviolable by both natives and foreigners, we may suppose that

(82) original:—A Chinn Chopað carói Brian;
nó carói in ríamh do bí ort,
carói maite no meic rí,
Sa n-íbmír fín do poit?

(83) original:—Ír maire atá beó san Brian,
Ír mór Mac Liag o'n linn;
Dom togarann go tíg na réo,
Do tíg do fó éeo, a Chinn.

(84) original:—An oir taimic tuirim bhríam maire atá ar dothan na díar
a teótar eic anoir
in oir duinn marbað mhurchaí.

he availed himself of that circumstance to mix with the combatants as much as was consistent with his safety from the accidents of a battle-field, so as to collect all the detailed information that could be useful to his task of recording a full account of the great scene at which he assisted.

At what place or time after the battle Mac Coisé visited his friend Mac Liag, and related to him the particulars of the great overthrow of the Danes, and the sad news of the fall of Brian, of Murchadh, and of the flower of the Dalcassian army, does not appear; but it is most probable that it was at Ceann Coradh; and it must have been immediately after the battle, since Mac Liag himself, as I shall soon show, visited the scene of the conflict so early as before the interment of the slain had been concluded.

It is very probable that on the occasion of this visit Mac Liag was able to collect a great many additional details of the battle from the survivors of both parties, and that on his return home, either by himself or assisted by Mac Coisé, he compiled from the beginning this "History of the Wars of the Danes", or else added to the part which he had already compiled the account of the Battle of Clontarf as collected by Mac Coisé and himself.

But to return to the dialogue between the two poets. Mac Coisé, in the fourth and fifth stanzas of this poem, bears testimony to the bravery and nobleness of Brian; and in the exaggeration of his feelings, goes so far as even to assert that so great a sacrifice as his had not been offered on the altar of Justice, Truth, and Religion, since the Great Sacrifice on Calvary itself. Mac Liag, then, in the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth stanzas, continues his inquiries as to whether Murchadh and many other leaders whom he names, had really fallen. And in answer to these questions, Mac Coisé, at the eleventh stanza, gives the names of several of the chiefs who fell, and describes the position in which they lay dead on the battle-field. At the eighteenth stanza he launches out into exclamations of despairing grief; and he then continues to the end to review the most important incidents in Brian's life and reign. This interesting poem concludes with the following curious stanza:

"There were found at St. Feichin's frigid bed,
Wells of overflowing blood,
The sign of kingly Brian's death,
In the western border land of Erin."<sup>(85)</sup>

The place mentioned here as Saint Feichin's bed is the an-

<sup>(85)</sup> original:—*Fhíe in iomdóig fheichín fuair cobair 'na b-fuil pobair bpuair;
comaircá báir bhruam na m-beann
i g-cric iarcáir na h-Eireann.*

LECT. VI.

[Of Mac Liag.]

cient abbey of Cong, in the county of Mayo, which was founded by Saint Feichin, who died in the year 664; but of the legend of the bloody wells, and their connection with the death of Brian Boromha, I have never met any other account.

7th,—The seventh and last piece which O'Reilly attributes to Mac Liag, is a poem of five stanzas, or twenty lines, beginning:

"It is a long time to be without happiness,

Such as I never thought I should be;

When I was at the splendid Ceann Coradh,

Little did I fear that any one should rob me".<sup>(86)</sup>

O'Reilly states that: "This poem was written by the author when he had retired to Innsé Gall, (the Hebrides), after the death of Brian Boromha, and in it bitterly laments his absence from Ceann Coradh, and his want of the pleasures he was there accustomed to enjoy". He is mistaken as to the place at which Mac Liag is said to have written the poem, which was "Innsé an Ghaill Duibh" (i. e. the Island of the Black Foreigner), in the Upper Shannon, and not Innsé Gall, the Hebrides—a region with which for the rest Mac Liag had no connection.

If Mac Liag was the author of this poem at all, it is the worst preserved, and the most corrupt and insipid, of all his poems with which I happen to be acquainted.

So much for those of Mac Liag's works mentioned in the list by O'Reilly; but I have also to mention a few more undoubtedly genuine pieces of that celebrated bard's composition, which are not described by that collector.

The first of these pieces of Mac Liag's is one which O'Reilly had seen, though he has not described it,—a poem of thirty-three stanzas, or one hundred and thirty-two lines, which gives an account of why and when Brian's town and palace of Ceann Coradh had received the alias name of Boromha. The poet describes in this piece how he happened to have been at Ceann Coradh, on one occasion when Brian's tribute of cows from Leinster and Ulster was being driven home; that he went out from the court to look at them; and that he returned again, and said to Brian: "Here comes Erin's tribute of cows to thee: many a fat cow and fat hog on the plain before thee". "Be they ever so many", said Brian, "they shall all be thine, O noble poet!" Whereupon it was that Mac Liag gave the name of Boromha to the town and plain; a name which literally means nothing more than a multitude of cows, either paid as tribute

<sup>(86)</sup> original: —*Fada beir gan aibneap,
map n'ar fáileap go b'áir beir, map do b'ior a 5-Ceann-Chopaib éamh níor oíam liom don dam éneic.*

by, or carried off as prey from, an enemy. It is probable that it was upon this occasion also that Brian himself received the addition to his name of Boromha, or "of the Tribute of Cows", though the fact is not stated in this copy of Mac Liag's poem. I. ECT. VI.
[OF Mac Liag.]

The poet proceeds to give an account of the amount and kind of the tribute sent to Brian to Ceann Coradh from the various tribute-paying provinces and territories of Erin; among which we find an item of one hundred and fifty butts of wine from the Danes of Dublin, and one of a tun of wine per day from the Danes of Limerick. He then describes the order in which the royal and noble guests of Brian sat around him in the great hall of Ceann Coradh. Brian himself, we are told, sat at the head, with the King of Connacht on his right hand, and the King of Ulster (Ulidia or West Ulster) on his left, and the King of Tír-Eoghan opposite to him. At the door-post, nearest to Brian, sat the King of Leinster, and at the other post of the open door sat Donnchadh (Donogh), son of Brian, and Mael-seachlainn (Malachy) the King of Meath. Murchadh (Morogh), Brian's eldest son, sat in front of his father, with his back to him; with Aenghus, the son of Carrach, a valiant prince of Meath, on his right hand, and the King of Tír Conaill on his left. This position of Murchadh would seem to imply that Brian occupied a seat elevated above the rest of the seats in the hall. Tadhg, son of Brian, and Tadhg O'Kelly, King of Ui Mainé, sat at the end or side opposite to the door, on Brian's right hand; and Maelruanaigh, chief of Ui Fiachra (in South Connacht), sat on Tadhg's right hand. Such, then, was the arrangement, so far as this poem goes;—a poem of which, I am sorry to say, I know but of one copy, and that a bad one, made by Edward O'Reilly, now in the library of the Royal Irish Academy. It begins:

"Boromha! home of the kings!

City of the renowned warriors of Munster!

Since Brian the illustrious has sprung up,

The noble chief of free-born clans".<sup>(67)</sup>

2nd,—The second piece by Mac Liag, not described by O'Reilly, is a poem of twenty-five stanzas, or one hundred lines, on the origin and history of an ancient sepulchral heap of stones, called Carn Chonaill, situated in the present county of Galway. This poem begins:

"Know ye the history from which", etc.<sup>(68)</sup>

<sup>(67)</sup> original:—*boromha baile na rí, poirt na múinne, rocla an rí,
ó ro eirí brian breítha,
cenn roclaí gae raon feneítha.*

<sup>(68)</sup> original:—fínoíad in rianáir oia tá.

LECT. VI.

The history
of Carn Cho- naill. (Poem of Mac
Liag.)

The history of Carn Chonaill is shortly this. After the defeat of the Firbolgs by the Tuatha Dé Danann, in the great battle of the southern Mugh Tuiredh (as described in a former Lecture),<sup>(89)</sup> they fled the country, and a part of them took refuge in the Hebrides, where they remained until driven out by the Picts; upon which they returned to Erin, in the reign of Cairbré Nia-fear (a short time before the Incarnation). At this time they were known as the Sons of Umór (Clann Umoir), and were led by their native chief Aengus, the son of Umór. On their arrival in Erin, they went directly to Tara, and besought the King, Cairbré, to give them some rich lands in Meath, for which they were willing to pay him a fair rent. The King complied with their request; but obliged them to give him securities for their good conduct and integrity. They vouched to him, then, as pledges, the celebrated warriors Ceat Mac Magach, of Connacht, Ross Mac Deaghaidh, of Munster, and Cuchulainn and Conall Cearnach, of Ulster. The Umoirians, however, soon found that the burthens which the avaricious king laid on them were too heavy; and they therefore resolved secretly to fly from Cairbré's rule, and to pass into Connacht, where they had contrived to conciliate the favour of Ailill and Medhbh, the King and Queen of that province. They set out, accordingly, by night, with all their property; crossed the Shannon in safety, and were allowed to settle themselves in the southern parts of Connacht, more particularly in the present counties of Galway and Clare, the latter forming at that time part of Connacht.

Aengus, the chief of the Clann Umoir, settled himself in the islands of Arann, and built the noble stone fortress which bears his name to this day, Dun Aengus, in the Great Island of Arran; Cutra, the son of Umor, settled at Loch Cutra (now called Lough-Cooter, in the present county of Galway); Conall, son of Umor, in Aidhné in the same district; Adhar, son of Umor, at Mugh Adhair, the celebrated place of inauguration of the Dalcassian chiefs (in the present county of Clare); Dael, son of Umor, at Daelach, to the north of Ennistimon (in the same county); and so on as to the several other chiefs of the party.

In the meantime the King of Tara demanded of his securities their pledge, and the four warriors passed into Connacht, to take the sons of Umor; but the answer which they received was, an offer of combat to each. The combatants met; and Cing, the son of Umor, fell by the hand of Rossa Mac Deadhaidh, the Munster security; Cimé, the son of Umor, by Conall Cear-

(89) See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 245.

nach; Iargas, the son of Umor, by Cet Mac Magach; and Conall Cael ("the slender"), son of Aengus, the chief, by Cuchulainn; and it was over this young chief that his father and friends raised the heap of stones, which from him took the name of Carn Chonaill. Such is the history of that Carn, as related by Mac Liag in this poem. LECT. VI.
[Of Mac
Liag.]

There are copies of this curious poem preserved in the Books of Leinster, Ballymote, and Lecain; and in all these copies in the concluding stanza Mac Liag avows himself as the author.

3rd,—The third piece of Mac Liag's which O'Reilly omits, is one which he had not seen; it is a poem of forty-four stanzas, or one hundred and seventy-six lines, in praise of Tadhg O'Kelly, chief of Ui Mainé, which begins:

"The blessing of Abruin be upon Bright,
In my house is no small number of her gifts;
But Abruin! I say without anger,
That my friend excels your friend.
"Tadhg the prosperous is my friend,
On whom poems by qualified bards are made;
He is the bravest man to guide a ship;
He is the distributor of small spoils".<sup>(90)</sup>

(The poet does not mean to assert in this last line, that the spoils which O'Kelly was accustomed to distribute were small, or of little value; but that his patron's soul was so great that the richest spoils and preys were but trifles in his eyes.)

It would appear from the opening of this poem, that Mac Liag addressed it to his own wife Abruin; who, it would also appear, had recently received some important marks of favour from O'Kelly's wife Bright, to whom he makes acknowledgment, but hinting at the same time that as O'Kelly was a better friend to the poet than O'Kelly's wife to the poet's wife, it was fairly to be expected that O'Kelly's next exercise of his bounty in favour of his bard would be liberal in proportion.

It appears also that at some previous period the poet's homestead had been plundered of its cows, by a party from Westmeath; and that the plunderers were followed across the Shannon by Tadhg O'Kelly, with his household troops, and many of the other chiefs of Ui Mainé, who recovered and restored them.

<sup>(90)</sup> original:—bennaect abruim an bhríge,
fuil am tíg ním náe anait,
do éuaro, a abruim, gan bapa,
mo éapa tar do éapait.
capa dáimra taós toirtead,
da n-óentap dān bapo n-óletead,
iré ip fearp iét im apneac
iré marbtead na minépead.

LECT. VI.
[Of Mac
Liag.]

The names of the chiefs of Ui Mainé who took part in this enterprise are given in the poem, and the two concluding stanzas contain a handsome apostrophe to Brian Boromha, his son Murchadh, and his nephew Conaing; indicating that the poem was written before the fatal battle of Clontarf, in which these three warriors, as well as O'Kelly himself, lost their lives in the defence of their country.

4th,—The fourth piece of Mac Liag's which O'Reilly had not seen, is a poem of sixty-eight stanzas, or two hundred and seventy-two lines, in praise of Tadhg O'Kelly and some of his allies on the east side of the Shannon; such as the chief of north Filé (in Tipperary), and the chiefs of Delvin, and Teffia, (in Westmeath). This poem is something in the nature of a call to arms; in which all the chiefs of Ui Mainé, as well as their friends in South Connacht and on the east of the Shannon, are called upon by their respective names, to burnish their shields and prepare for battle. Many of the successful battles, preys, and plunders of Tadhg O'Kelly are given; and the poem ends with a call on Brian Boromha and his son Murchadh to burnish their shields and stand as usual to the defence of their country. This most curious and historical poem begins:

“ Let the King of Gaela's shield be burnished;
Bring dazzling flashes from its face;
Nine score and one shields that have been Abandoned to the shield I now see.”<sup>(91)</sup>

O'Kelly is here spoken of as King of Gaela, merely because the word Gaela, which was a minor chieftaincy in the territory of Ui Mainé (situate in the present barony of Leitrim, in the county of Galway), suited the measure of his verse.

5th,—The fifth piece of Mac Liag's which O'Reilly had not seen, is a poem of unknown length, as, unfortunately, only the first fifty-four stanzas, or two hundred and sixteen lines, of it remain accessible to modern investigators. This fragment, as well as the two poems of Mac Liag's, which have been last described, are preserved in a few folios of the ancient Book of Ui Mainé, now in the British Museum; a volume which was compiled by Seann Mór O'Duibhagáin, chief poet and historian to the princely house of O'Kelly, chiefs of Ui Mainé, who died in the year 1372. This ancient book, by some chance, passed into the hands of the late Sir William Betham, who sold it to the Duke of Buckingham for one hundred and fifty pounds; and at the

<sup>(91)</sup> original:—Sciath rug gaela, glantar hi
cracha carice pór a cliú;
sciath ar nai píctib sciath
do fágad 'gón sciath do cliú.

sale of the magnificent library of Stowe, in London, in the year 1849, it passed by private sale, along with the other valuable collections of the Stowe Irish Manuscripts, into the possession of Lord Ashburnham. In his possession all Irish MSS. are concealed, as I had occasion to observe with sorrow before, with a churlish jealousy greatly at variance with what might have been supposed to be the intellectual cultivation of the owner, and in a spirit very hostile, indeed, to the general desire of the present age to facilitate the efforts now being made throughout the whole of Europe to investigate all such sources as can be deemed likely to throw new light on the migrations of men, and the march of civilization, in times long gone by. How or when the few folios now in the British Museum were parted from the original book, I cannot say; but they passed into that noble institution some twenty-four years ago, among the collection of Irish MSS. sold to it by the late James Hardiman. The fragment in the Museum contains these poems of Mac Liag and some other pieces, and breaks off from the original book just where the present poem stops, where the chasm appears to be a comparatively recent one; so that there is every reason to hope that the concluding part of this most curious poem, and several others of the same authors, remain still in the book itself, though it is to be feared it is doomed never to be made accessible in our time. This poem begins:

“Heavily,—yet lightly,—have I come to Dublin,
To the Court of Amlaibh of the golden shields;
From Dublin of the swords and the graves,
Swiftly, yet slowly, shall be my departure.

“O men of Dublin of the bells!
Including abbots and bishops,
Raise not the earth over Tadhg [O’Kelly],
Until I have bestowed upon him a last look.

“Ye sons of Harold! ye reddeners of spears!
Ye remnant of Denmark’s heroic bands!
Ui Mainé’s chief is of no foreign growth,
Or a remnant of an ignoble spurious race.”<sup>(92)</sup>

<sup>(92)</sup> original:—leasg, amleasg, rino gu ath cliath co sun amlaib na n-ór reath
o ath cliath na lano rna leet ir oian ir mall mo imteet.
▲ luét aea cliat na clog eioir abair ir eapbog na cuip uir tap taós coir
co taig sunn a vechrain.
▲ fil ariat, puadar pao,
a iapma laechar loelano,
ní gall da mang, ó maine
ní pao dair na veargame.

LECT. VI.

[Of Mac Liag.]

The poet then goes on to lament that O'Kelly had not taken the advice of his maternal uncle, Maelseachlainn (Malachy), the deposed monarch, (then King of Meath), who pressed him to abandon Brian and the Munstermen before entering the battle, offering him more substantial marks of his royal favour and consideration than he could expect to receive from Brian; all of which overtures the noble O'Kelly rejected with scorn, sealing with his life on the bloody field of Clontarf his fidelity to his honour, to his friend, and to his country. Maelseachlainn's overtures to Tadhg O'Kelly (who was his sister's son) are fully described here; and they form the most complete evidence of the treachery of the King of Meath at Clontarf that has ever yet come to light.

After this the poet goes on to declare that he will not live after Brian and Tadhg. He then proceeds to bid adieu to various places in Connacht and Munster; after which he mentions several of the battles, plunders, and preys, won by Tadhg O'Kelly, and portions of the spoils of which were always bestowed upon himself. He then recounts a characteristic story concerning a meeting of the provincial kings and nobles of Erin which, on a certain occasion, assembled at Brian's court at Ceann Coradh; among whom were Maelseachlainn, King of Meath; Aedh O'Neill, King of Ulster; Tadhg O'Kelly, King of Ui Mainé, and several others. It happened, we are told, on this occasion, that while the henchmen of Brian and of Tadhg O'Kelly were burnishing the shields of their respective masters, a dispute arose between them, as to the claims of precedence respectively of the noble owners of the two shields. The dispute ran so high that at last Tadhg's page raised his arm and struck Brian's page a violent blow with his fist on the mouth, from which the blood flowed freely over the richly ornamented dress he wore.

Here, however, the poem breaks off abruptly: the remainder of it is, unfortunately, in the possession of Lord Ashburnham. Were it in that of any real lover of literature, he would surely send the fragment, and the old Book of Ui Mainé which contains it, over here, to be at least transcribed, so as to be made available for the important purposes of our antiquarian researches. But it is idle to expect so much of public spirit or scholarlike feeling at the hands of such a collector as the nobleman just referred to. It is probable that the Book of Ui Mainé contains many more of the poems of Mac Liag and his contemporaries; but we can only surmise about them for the present.

From Mac Liag we now pass to Errard Mac Coisé, who was chief poet to the court of Maelseachlainn (Malachy), the predecessor, and afterwards the successor of Brian Boromha in the monarchy of Erin, who died in the year 1022.

LECT. VI.
Of Mac Coisé, and his Poems.

Of Mac Coisé's compositions I know but five pieces to be now extant, four poems and one prose-piece. Of the first two of these poems and of the prose tract I possess correct copies. Of the third poem there is a copy in the Royal Irish Academy, as well as an imperfect copy of the prose tract. Of the fourth poem there is, I believe, a copy in the possession of John O'Donovan, LL.D.<sup>(93)</sup>

The first of these poems is one of twenty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and eight lines, in praise of the same king Maelseachlainn, and of the chief princes of Erin his cotemporaries, among whom were Brian Boromha and Tadhg O'Kelly, who, it appears, however, were both dead at the time of writing this poem. This very scarce and valuable poem begins:

"Maelseachlainn, the senior line of the Gaedhils,—

It is fit that all men should celebrate him,—

The fierce destroyer of his foes,—

The brown-haired heir of Domhnall".<sup>(94)</sup>

2nd,—The second poem, which perhaps ought to have been the first described, consists of fifty-two stanzas, or two hundred and eight lines, and opens by way of a dialogue between Mac Liag, already mentioned, and Mac Coisé. This poem appears to have been written in Dublin, where both the bards must have been sojourning together at the time. Mac Liag opens the dialogue with a warm eulogy on Brian Boromha and the Dalcassians, and boasts loudly of the veneration he enjoyed, and of the favours and gifts which he was at all times sure to receive from them. Mac Coisé interrupts him at the seventh stanza by asking some details of the Dalcassian munificence. Mac Liag answers in two more stanzas; and then at the tenth stanza Mac Coisé takes up the cause of the kings and nobles of Meath, Ulster, and Connacht, and in the remaining part supplies a number of curious instances of the hospitality and munificence which he had himself in his professional character received from those various personages. This poem begins:

"Long be thy life, O generous Errard!

Mac Coisé of the splendid intellect;

<sup>(93)</sup> [This great Irish scholar was still living when this lecture was delivered. He died in November, 1861, at the comparatively early age of fifty-three—only a few months before his distinguished brother-in-law, Professor O'Curry.]

<sup>(94)</sup> original:—*maelreclainn rinnreap gaoidéal, córú do éac a domhsaoidéam foll foglae na fóinne, ua flainn
oighe donnabrac domhail.*

LECT. VI.

[Of Mac Coisé.]

It is time that we return to our homes ;

We have been here a whole year.

“ Though short to you and to me may seem

This our sojourn in Dublin,

Brian of Banba deems it too long

That he listens not to my eloquence.

“ Not to hear the history of the great sons of Milesius,

And of the brave and beautiful Tuatha Dé Danann,

And along with these that he hears not

The conquests of the noble monarchs of Erin”.<sup>(95)</sup>

This poem affords us what may be called a living illustration of the important office which the court poet filled of old, and of the style of the social enjoyments of our ancient kings and princes. It affords also a clear verification of that part of the tract on the “Seven Degrees of the Poets”, which relates to the office of Ollamh, or chief poet, to which reference has so often been made in the course of these Lectures.<sup>(96)</sup>

Edward O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 990, mentions this poem; but he appears not to have read it with sufficient care, since he says it was addressed to Mac Coisé himself, and that it is more likely it was written by some one of his contemporaries. O'Reilly also felt some difficulty about the identity of Errard Mac Coisé; because Tighernach the annalist mentions the death of one great scholar of the name at the year 990, while the Four Masters record the death of another great scholar of the same name and in the same words at the year 1023. But whether there were two poets named Errard Mac Coisé, and whether they died in those respective years, or not, does not affect the authorship of these two poems, as they bear internal evidence of their having been written by the same man, and that that man lived shortly after the death of King Mael-seachlainn, which took place in the year 1022.

3rd,—The third is a poem of twenty-six stanzas, or one hundred and four lines, in praise of Maelruanaidh, the second son

(95) original:—Maṛtáin dúit a ṡaṡṡaí féil,
a ṡic Coṡe ṡo ceann céill
ṡṡ mṡṡo dúinn ceáṡṡ o'ar coṡṡ, acamaṡo abur blaṡṡoṡn. ṡṡo ṡaṡṡo leatṡa aṡur linn,
moenur rinn aṡ Duṡṡṡṡṡ
ṡṡ ṡaṡa le ṡṡian Banba
ṡan eṡṡceáṡṡ nem' uplaṡṡa. ṡan ṡcéla ṡac mṡṡo mṡṡ
ṡṡ Tuáṡ De Danann oṡeaṡ mṡṡ, ṡan a ṡ-cloṡṡceáṡṡ ceann a cceann,
ṡabala aṡṡo-ṡṡṡ eṡṡeann.

(96) See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 220, 240; and Appendix, No. I., p. 461-3.

of Tadhg of the Tower, King of Connacht, and ancestor of the O'Connor family, who died in the year 954, and was succeeded by his eldest son Conor. Maelruanaidh, the second son, became lord of the territory of Magh Luirg in East Connacht, and was the ancestor of the families of Mac Dermot and Mac Donagh, of that country. The poet describes a visit which he paid to this chief at his princely residence, and the entertainment and gifts which he received on the occasion. Among these presents were, a chessboard; a valuable sword; fifty milch cows; and thirty steeds, "fit to appear at fairs and assemblies". This curious poem begins:

LECT. VI.
[Prose piece
by Mac
Coiséd.]

"Thou warrior of Queen Meadhbh's plain,— Thou king of popular Cruachan,— Thou valiant guardian of thy people,— Thou brave protector of Milesian Erin".<sup>(97)</sup>

Edward O'Reilly had not seen this poem; and the only copy of it that I know to be extant is one in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy.

4th.—The fourth piece of Mac Coisé's compositions, is a poem of twenty-two stanzas, or eighty-eight lines, written by him on the death of old Fergal O'Ruairc, King of Connacht, (the ancestor of the celebrated family of the O'Ruaircs of Breifné, or Breifne), who was killed in battle in East Meath, A.D. 964, according to the Annals of the Four Masters. This poem begins:

"A poet is sorrowful after his king".<sup>(98)</sup>

I am not aware of any existing copy of this poem but one, which is in the possession of John O'Donovan, LL.D., and which I have not been able to examine. O'Reilly, in his Irish Writers, at the year 990, seemed to think that Mac Coisé, the author of this poem, (who, according to Tighernach's annals, died in the year 990), was a different person from the Mac Coisé of whom we have been just speaking, who died in the year 1023.

"The Four Masters", he says, "under the year 1023, record the death of an Erard Mac Coisé; but from the poem on the death of Fergal O'Ruairc above-mentioned, written immediately after the fall of that king in 964, when the writer must have been of full age, it would appear that the Erard Mac Coisé of the Four Masters, and the Urard Mac Coisé of Tighernach, were two distinct persons".

<sup>(97)</sup> original:—a ceapmaro muige meabha,
a piú cruacán comféadma,
a buacail tarbba na tteab,
a díon banba mac milead.

<sup>(98)</sup> original:—bíonn ollam o'ér a piú.

LECT. VI.

[Prose piece
by Mac
Coisé.]

I have already stated my belief that O'Reilly was mistaken in his opinion; and that the Mac Coisé of Tighernach and the Mac Coisé of the Four Masters were one and the same person. For, supposing, as O'Reilly says, that Mac Coisé must have been a man of full age in the year 964, when he is believed to have written this poem, and supposing him to have been then twenty-four years of age, old enough to be a writer, and that he died in 1023, his age would be but eighty-two, or at most eighty-three years: but the Chronicon Scotorum gives the death of Fergal O'Ruairc at the year 966, which, on the same hypothesis, would reduce the poet's age to eighty, or at most eighty-one years, a span of life no way extraordinary in that age any more than in this. But whether or not a Mac Coisé died in the year 990, according to Tighernach and the Chronicon Scotorum, there is evidence enough remaining to prove that the Mac Coisé who died in the year 1023 was the author of the poem on Fergal O'Ruairc; for in the poem which Mac Coisé wrote on King Maelseachlainn (or Malachy) and his contemporaries, which I have already described, Mac Coisé mentions by name all the great Irishmen who had lived within Malachy's life-time; and among these he gives a distinguished place to old Fergal O'Ruairc, and winds up with a sorrowful expression of regret that he himself, who had been their contemporary, should have outlived them all.

5th.—The fifth and last piece of Mac Coisé's composition, is a prose tract of a very extraordinary character; and though it is in some sort a digression from the more direct subject of the present Lecture, I cannot refrain from giving some account of the details of a piece which contains so much, both in its matter and in its form, that is particularly interesting, in reference to the manners and habits of the time. The following short account of the cause of its composition is prefixed to the tract, in language as old as the original text, and, in my belief, in Mac Coisé's own words.

This account states that it was Urard Mac Coisé that framed this piece of composition for the O'Neils of Ulster, who had unlawfully plundered his castle at Clartha (now Clara, in the county of Westmeath), in revenge for his having wounded one of their people, named Muiredhach, son of Eoghan. They demolished the poet's castle, and carried off his household furniture and his precious jewels, as well as his cows and his horses. The poet was absent at the time; and on his return to his family, he saw no prospect of redress against enemies so powerful, unless by the exercise of his art and the influence it gave him; and to this he had recourse. After some time, then, he set out to the palace of Aileach (near Derry), the ancient residence of the Kings of Ulster of the Clann Neill line, and at this time the abode of Domhnall O'Neil, Monarch of Erin, (who died in the year 978). LECT. VI.

[Prose piece
by Mac
Coisé.]

The poet arrived at Aileach rather early in the day, and before the king had risen; but when the monarch had heard of the arrival of such a guest, welcome as a great poet and historian was, everywhere, in those days, he at once ordered him to his presence; and having warmly received him, he proceeded to demand of him what tales he had to recite in the exercise of his art. Mac Coisé answered that he had a great many, and begged that the king would select from the ancient chief historic tales of Erin, one or more that he should wish to hear. The king requested the poet to give him the names of those great tales, in order that he might be the better able to make a selection.

Mac Coisé then repeats the list of those great tales, under the various heads, such as I have already presented them, when speaking of the particular qualifications of each of the seven degrees of the poets.<sup>(99)</sup> He began with the death of Cuchulainn; Cuchulainn's decline after the assault of the two Ben-Sidhes; the Táin-Bo-Chuailgné; and so on through the whole list;—into which, however, Mac Coisé introduces many tales not mentioned in the ordinary lists. With all these the king seemed to be familiar, except the last on the poet's list, to which he had given the title of: "The Plunder of the Castle of Maelmilscothach, the son of the Venerable Name, son of the Noble Teacher of the Hosts, son of the Ollamh in Poetry, son of Legitimate Poetry, son of Lugaidh, Master of all the Arts, son of the Red Man of all Knowledge, son of the Faith of the Holy Spirit with the Father and the Son".<sup>(100)</sup>

These were the wild names, and such was the symbolical pedigree, which Mac Coisé made for himself; while the "Plunder of the Castle of Maelmilscothach", of which he proposed to give the history, was in fact but the plunder of his own castle at Clartha. Mac Coisé's Tale of the
"Plunder of the Castle of
Maelmilscothach".

The name Maelmilscothach, which Mac Coisé gave himself, means Mael "of the honeyed words", from mil, honey, and scoth, a word. Lugaidh, "Master of all the Arts", whom he counts among his ancestors, was the celebrated Tuath Dé Danann chief, Lug, the son of Cian, more commonly called Lug Mac

<sup>(99)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 220, 241,

<sup>(100)</sup> original:—Orgain catpach maol miltcotaig, mic anma aipmice mic Socairc Socaroe, mic Ollamain aipcetaig, mic Dana Oligeatdaig, mic Luigeod iloanaig, mic Ruaro Rofera, mic Cpeitme in Spipica Naith, atair rec mac.

LECT. VI.
Mac Coisé's
 Tale of the
 "Plunder of the Castle of Maelmáscó-
thach".

Ceithlenn, from his mother, of whom a full description was given in speaking of the Battle of the Northern Magh Tuiredh, in a former Lecture.<sup>(101)</sup> The Ruadh Rofheasa, or "Red Man of all Knowledge", was the celebrated Tuath Dé Danann king, the great Daghda. And Mac Coisé makes use of the names of these two personages to symbolize his intimate acquaintance with all the pagan literature of ancient Erin, in the same way that he makes his descent from the Holy Spirit, the Father, and the Son, the symbol of his intimate knowledge of the Christian literature of the time.

When the king, Domhnal O'Neil, heard the title of this tale, and the name and pedigree of the lord of the plundered castle, he declared that he had never before heard of it, and eagerly desired to hear the full history of the plunder alluded to. Mac Coisé then commenced the tale, by relating the circumstance that led to his loss, and describing in a very imaginative style the character and prowess of the parties who took part in the violence of which he complained. It was somewhat as follows:

At the approach of the hostile party to the castle, the beautiful nymph Poetry, daughter of the Arts, who resided within, ascended to the top of the building, to beseech them to spare it on her account; for she believed that her inviolability would save it from any injury. With this view she accosted the spokesman of the party, asking who and what they were, what they wanted, and what were the names of their leaders. The spokesman answers by giving their names according to their etymological signification; such as "Tené n-aen beime", which means literally "fire of one stroke", that is, the fire struck by one stroke on a flint. This fire is evidently but a spark; and the Irish for a spark of fire is Aedh, or Udh, as it is pronounced; and Aedh is the proper Christian name of a man, (now Anglicised Hugh). The name of the second chief man of the party, he said, was Nuall Domain, (from nuall, "noble", and doman, "the world",) that is, the noblest of the world; of which two words the Christian name Domhnall, (now Anglicised Donnell), is but a condensed transposition. The name of the third champion, he said, was Nel Mac Laeich Lasamain, that is, Light, the son of the Blazing Warrior, (from nel, "light", laeich, "a champion", and lasamain, "blazing" or radiant). This Nell (or Niall, as the name is more commonly written), was son of the Aedh mentioned above, whose name was interpreted fire or flame; etc. And so the spokesman goes on to give the names of the chief men of his party under these obscure designations.

(101) See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 249, 250.

The nymph Poetry then inquires whether the assailants would not prefer the precious jewels of poetic eloquence and eulogium, to the torturing lashes of poetic satire, of both of which she had, she said, an abundant stock to bestow, from the laudations of Mac Lonain, the satires of Morán, the eloquence of Laidech, the stories of Laeach Liathmhúim, the obscure proverbs of Fíthal, the philosophy of the Perceirtnés, the intellect of the poetess Edain, the brilliancy of Nera, the clear truths of the Princess Mór Mumhan, etc.

LECT. VI.
Mac Coise's
Tale of the
"Plunder of the Castle of
Maelmilscothach".

The answer which the plunderers made to this inquiry was a furious assault on the mansion, which they soon entered and proceeded to strip of all its movable property. Having emptied the house above ground, they next approached the cellar under ground; and here they were met at its doors by Dathghel, the guardian of that important place. The assailants ask Dathghel who were the defenders of the cellar, and if they were brave. And Dathghel tells them that it was defended by the best and bravest of Maelmilscothach's household, both men and women; and Dathghel gives them the names of a formidable band, by personifying the various articles of furniture, etc., in the house; such as Criol mac Craeslinaidh, that is, Chest, son of Fill-mouth; Boíc mac Bith-thellaigh, that is, Bellows, son of Constant Fireplace; Breacan mac Ban-ghresa, that is, Blanket, son of Woman's Work; Fidhbha mac Fo-chraebhaigh, that is, Hatchet, son of Tree Cutter; Lesan mac Dagh-shuaithe, that is, Bag, son of Good Yarn; Coiré mac Cruadh-ghobhann, that is, Pot, son of Hardy Smith; Cuagh mac Tornora, that is, Wooden Mug, the son of Turner; Loimdhá mac Lomhthogha, that is, Churn-staff, son of Choice Hands;—and so on. Such were the names of a few of the male defenders of Maelmilscothach's cellar; and the following were the names of a few of its female inmates: Lenn ingen Lamhthoraidh, that is, Mantle, the daughter of Manufacture; Leiné ingen Lin-ghuirt, that is, Shirt, daughter of Flax-field; Ceirtlé ingen Suimhairé, that is, Ball, or Bottom, daughter of Distaff; Suathad ingen Inuamai, that is, Needle, daughter of Stitcher; Corthair ingen Druinighé, that is, Fringe, daughter of Embroideress; Seuap ingen Gaironta, that is, Broom, daughter of Tidiness; Cir ingen Scribairé, that is, Comb, daughter of Scrubber; Sust ingen Tren-truaircneigh, that is, Flail, daughter of Powerful Thresher;—and so on.

I have dwelt at greater length than I intended on the names of these fanciful guardians of Maelmilscothach's cellar, because, though I have given but a few of them, they will serve to show how the castle was furnished in articles of domestic conve-

LECT. VI.

*Mac Coisé's
Tale of the
"Plunder of the Castle of Maelmilscot-hach".*

nience, so as to afford some interesting examples (which, though somewhat out of place here, I should be loth to pass over) of the ordinary appliances of domestic industry in the home of an Irish housewife a thousand years ago. But on this subject I mean to speak at some length on a future occasion.

In the piece which I am now describing, Mac Coisé continues to relate, with much force, the progress of the plunder of the castle. The enormity of the act is considerably increased in his account, by his stating that it was while Maelmilscothach himself had been engaged in attending on the king in one of his expeditions, and in the king's presence, that an account of the plunder of his mansion reached him. Upon hearing this, continues Mac Coisé, the king exclaimed: "Reproach me not; for the sky shall fall on the earth, the sea shall overleap its boundaries, and the human race shall be swept away, or thou shalt have restitution of the plundered property, together with full compensation for the violation of thy castle, in such manner as the men of Erin shall adjudge, in my presence". The king having thus promised material redress to Maelmilscothach, the latter then recalls the "six bloodhounds" which the just administration of the king had induced him to banish from him twenty years before. The names of these hounds in the story are Satire, Disgrace, Shame, Abuse, Blush, and Bitter Words; and these he sent after the plunderers to bring them immediately before the king. They were foiled, however, by "six fanciful pigs", which the plunderers sent against them; so that the king had, at last, to send out his own herald to command them to his presence. In the meantime the king called a council of the chiefs of his country, to take their advice as to what should be done for Maelmilscothach; and they unanimously recommended that full restitution should be made to him.

When Mac Coisé had thus fully described the wrongs done to Maelmilscothach, and the justice rendered him, he ends by avowing to the monarch that he was himself the plundered Maelmilscothach, and that Domhnall O'Neil himself was the king whose people had plundered him. He then addressed the person whom he supposed to have been the leader of the plundering party, in a poem of eighteen stanzas; but, though addressed to this person, it was intended as a panegyric on the king himself, and his family and race (the Clann Neill of Ulster); and he takes care to remind the king that Mac Coisé had been the tutor of himself and his brother, and that he had been reared by their father, the celebrated Muircheartach "of the Leather Cloaks", son of Níall Glundubh. This curious poem begins:

“O thou, yonder man, by our words of knowledge,
If it be thou that hast caused this disturbance;
Verily it is not without punishment [or] without battle,
That Maelmilscothach's cattle shall have been plundered”<sup>(102)</sup>

LECT. VI.

Mac Cois's
Tale of the “Plunder of the Castle of
Maelmilscothach”.

After this King Domhnall O'Neil really did call a council, to advise with them upon what should be done in Mac Cois's case; and the chiefs left it in the king's own hands to inflict what punishment he should think proper on the guilty parties, but offered from themselves a cow for every commander and royal champion in all Tir-Eoghain, to Mac Cois's, as restitution. In the meantime the chief historians, poets, and judges of Erin repaired to the king's presence, to demand, if necessary, a compensation proportionate with his rank for Mac Cois's, for the insult and violation offered to his sacred person and dignity; but the king having already conceded this, he had now only to call upon them to “assess the damages”, according to the ancient law which provided for such cases. All parties, thereupon, agreed in requesting to have the case submitted to the decision of Flann “the eloquent”, the head professor of the great school of Clonmacnois. This was done accordingly; and Flann awarded the poet full restitution of his property, full repairs of any injuries which his house might have sustained, and in addition fourteen Cumals (of three cows each), or forty-two cows, and “the breadth of his face of gold”, as compensation for the violation of his personal and professional dignity. And the learned men present on the occasion confirmed this decision, and, with the consent of the king and his chiefs, fixed these as the damages to be ever after paid in all similar cases, but to such poets only as were capable of composing the “Imbas Forosnai”, the “Dichetul-do-Chennaibh”, and the “Teinm Leaghdha”; three species of composition, the nature of which I have described in a former Lecture.<sup>(103)</sup>

This tale is remarkable for the vigour and purity of the language in which it is told; but it is especially useful to the purpose of our present inquiry for the important corroboration which it contains of the authenticity of other ancient tracts and pieces, which go more or less into minute descriptions of the state of civilization and the social economy of the Gaedhil at the period spoken of; that is, so far back, at least, as a thousand years ago.

<sup>(102)</sup> original:—a fip tall oap fepba fip, mara tu oo gni an m-buaruip, ar veip m gan ein gan eath oo aipeid maelmilscotach.

<sup>(103)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials, etc.; p. 240. See also, Lect. x.; post, p. 208, et seq.

LECTURE VII.

[Delivered 18th June, 1857.]

(III.) EDUCATION, AND LITERATURE; (continued). The Profession of Learning in ancient Erin established by law. Professors sometimes employed as rulers, or ministers of state. Of Cuan O'Lothchain; (ob. A.D. 1024). Descent of the O'Lothchains from Cormac Gaileng. Of the Poems of Cuan O'Lothchain. Of the Legend of the origin of the name of the river Simann (Shannon). The Eo Feasa ("Salmon of Knowledge"),—alluded to by Mac Liag; and by Aengus Finn O'Daly. Legend of the "Seven Streams of the Fountain of Connla". Of the History of Druim Criaich, (temp Eochaidh Feidhlech, circa B. C. 100). Of the History of the Cath Atha Comair. Of the history of Nial "of the Nine Hostages". Of the origin of the Fair of Tuillén. Poems of Flann Mainistrech. Of the origin of the Palace of Aileach. Of the Poem on Aileach by Cuaradh, (x. century).

The Profession of learning in ancient Erin established by law.

IN tracing the evidences of literary cultivation among the Gaedhils, and the education which it implies, I could not but take the opportunity of recording more precisely than those who have gone before me, the principal specimens which have come down to us of the learning and literary ability of the more remarkable professors in each century. The examples I have referred to ought, I think, to satisfy every one that the Gaelic language was always carefully cultivated, not only as the ordinary medium of instruction, but also of the preservation of historic facts, even centuries after the introduction of the Latin language with Christianity among the learned. It is to be remembered that every one of the Ollamhs or Fileas,—(Poets they are called in English, because they wrote in verse, but they more properly correspond with the Philosophers of the classic nations)<sup>(104)</sup>—every one of these writers, whose lives and whose works I am here shortly recounting, was a learned man by profession; every one of them had successfully studied for a regular legal rank or degree; and every one of them was entitled not only to fees for his labour as a teacher, but to important privileges and to other advantages under the law, in order to enable him to devote himself the better to the investigation of legal science and history, and to the public exercise of his literary powers, for the benefit of the people. Accordingly, it is not unusual to find these "Poets", (Philosophers, or Professors of Literature,) associated with the governing powers as political advisers to the king; and sometimes even themselves entrusted for a time with the cares of government, when particularly remarkable for their wisdom and ability. An instance of this honour is supplied in the case of the writer of whom I now proceed to speak, and whose name has been frequently mentioned before in the course of these lectures.

<sup>(104)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 2, note; and App. No. I. p. 461.

Next after Urard MacCoisé, the most eminent historical poet, in the order of time, was Cuan O'Lothchain, whose death is recorded in the following words in the Annals of Loch Cé (in Roscommon,) at the year 1024: "Cuan O'Lothchain, Chief Poet of Erin, was killed by the people of Teffia, [in Westmeath]. God manifestly wrought a poet's power upon the parties who killed him, for they were put to a cruel death, and their bodies putrefied until wolves and vultures had devoured them".

Professors sometimes employed as Rulers and Ministers of State.

All the other annals record the poet's death in nearly the same words.

Edward O'Reilly, in his "Irish Writers", (at the year 1024) speaks thus of O'Lothchain:

Of Cuan O'Lothchain; (ob. A.D. 1024.)

"Cuan O'Lochain, the most learned and celebrated antiquarian and historian of Ireland in his time, was killed in Teathbha [Teffia], this year, according to the concurrent testimonies of the Annals of Tighernach, Inisfallen, and the Four Masters. His talents and his virtues were so highly appreciated by his countrymen, that he was made joint-regent of Ireland with Corcran 'Cleirech', (or 'the Clergyman'), after the death of Maolsechlainn".

Dr. John O'Donovan, at page 42 of the Introduction to the "Book of Rights", (so ably edited by him for the Celtic Society, in the year 1847,) has the following remarks on O'Lothchain, whose poem on the Privileges and Restrictions of the Monarchs of Erin, is prefixed to that most curious and important Book:

"Cuan O'Lochain, or O'Lothchain, as he is sometimes called, or, as the name is more generally spelled, O'Lochain, was chief poet to Maelseachlainn (Malachy) II., monarch of Ireland, who died in 1022. After the death of this monarch, there was an interregnum of twenty years, and we are informed that Cuan O'Lochain and Corcran Cleireach were appointed governors of Ireland; but Cuan did not long enjoy this dignity, for he was slain in Teabhtha, (Teffia) A. D. 1024. Mr. Moore states, in his History of Ireland, vol. ii. page 147, that—'for this provisional government of Cuan he can find no authority in any of our regular annals': and it is certain", continues Dr. O'Donovan, "that no authority for it is found in any of the original Irish annals, nor even in the Annals of the Four Masters; but the fact is

LECT. VII.

Of Cuan
O'Lothchain;
(ob., A.D.
1024.)

stated as follows in Macgeoghegan's translation of the Annals of Clonmacnoise:

“A. D. 1022. After the death of King Moylescaghlyn, this kingdom was without a king twenty years, during [a portion of] which time the realm was governed by two learned men, the one called Cuan O'Lochan, a well-learned temporall man, and chiefe poet of Ireland; the other Corcran Cleireogh, a devout and holy man that was [chief] anchorite of all Ireland, whose most abiding was at Lismore. The land was governed like a free state, and not like a monarchie by them.

“A. D. 1024. Cuan O'Loghan, prime poet of Ireland, a great chronicler, and one to whom, for his sufficiencie, the causes of Ireland were submitted to be examined and ordered, was killed by one of the land of Teaffa; after committing of which evill fact, there grew an evill scent and odour of the party that killed him, that he was easily known among the rest of the land. His associate Corcran lived yett, and survived him for a long time after”.

It is a remarkable fact that the government of Ireland conjointly by the poet Cuan O'Lothchain and the priest Corcran, should be asserted or assented to by Charles O'Connor of Belanagare, in his pamphlet written against Sir Richard Cox, in 1749,—by Edward O'Reilly in his “Irish Writers”, published in 1820,—by Thomas Moore in his History of Ireland, published in 1836,—and by John O'Donovan in the “Book of Rights”, published in 1847,—without any more certain authority in support of it. It is probable, indeed, that Charles O'Connor was acquainted with the authority; but it is clear that none of those who followed him were so. It is undeniable that this fact is not to be found in any of our regular annals; it is, however, recorded in an older authority than any of the existing copies of our regular annals, namely, in the Book of Leinster itself, which was written about the year 1150. In a list of the succession of the Christian monarchs of Erin, from Laeghairé Mac Neil down to Roderick O'Connor, preserved in this valuable book, the death of king Malachy the Second (Maelseachlainn), is recorded in its proper place (at the year 1022); and the following entry appears immediately after it:

“A joint government of Erin during forty-two years, or fifty, Cuan O'Lothchain and Corcran the cleric”.<sup>(105)</sup>

Along with the doubt of the scribe in the text of this article, as to whether the term was forty-two or fifty years, there is another correction or suggestion in the margin, in the original hand and in the same Roman numerals, making the number of L. ECT. VII.

<sup>(105)</sup> Original:—“Complacatur for heinn fm pe da bliadain .xl. no l., Cuan Olothchain, Corcran cleric”.

years sixty-four.

Here, then, is a most respectable authority for this provisional government of Erin; and one which Moore, with all his scepticism, would have gladly recognized. The doubt of the scribe as to the exact number of years could apply only to Corcran, in whom the term was prolonged, and must have arisen from some mistake or obscurity of the preceding scribe, which he endeavoured to correct.

From anything that I have been able to discover, Cuan O'Lothchain had never been chief poet to King Malachy; nor, indeed, could he have been so, since his contemporary MacCoisé had held that distinguished office down to the monarch's death.

The O'Lothchains were a family of distinction, and chiefs of the territory of Gailenga Móra, or Great Gailenga; (situated in Meath and Longford, and now known in the former county as the barony of Morgallion); but they were first settled in the district of Eilé, (in Tipperary and King's County). The history of their descent is worth alluding to for more than one reason.

The O'Lothchains were descended from Cormac Gaileng, the son of Tadhg, son of Cian, son of Oilioll Olúim, king of Munster. Tadhg's father Cian and his six brothers were killed in the battle of Magh Macruimhé, (near Ath-an-Righ, in the county of Galway), in the year 194, while maintaining the cause of their uncle Art (the father of the celebrated Cormac Mac Airt), the monarch of Erin, who also fell there, against Mac Con, their step-brother and Art's nephew.

After the death of Art and the prolonged reign of Mac Con, Cormac the son of Art at last came to the throne; but he was almost immediately attacked and expelled from power by Fergus Dubh-deadach, (i.e. "of the black tooth"), an Ultonian prince, who attempted to seize on the government of the nation by force. In this extremity Cormac went into Munster to seek assistance from Oilioll Olúim, the king of that province, who was married to his aunt Sadhbh, the daughter of Conn "of the Hundred Battles".

With the consent of the old king Oilioll, his grandson Tadhg the son of Cian already mentioned agreed to come to the assistance of his cousin Cormac with such forces as he could raise in Munster; but on the condition that if he were successful in driving out Fergus and his brothers from Tara, he should have a recompense out of the land which his valour had recovered; terms to which Cormac was but too glad to assent. Tadhg accordingly mustered as large a force as he could within his native province, and among the leading chiefs who joined his standard,

Of Cuan O'Lothchain;
(ob. A.D. 1024.)

The descent
of the
O'Lothchains
from Cormac Gaileng.

LECT. VII.

we are told, was his grandfather's brother, the aged warrior Lugaidh Lagha, who had been present at the battle of Magh Macruimhé, and who had himself actually cut off the head of the monarch Art on the battle-field, but who now resolved to make amends to his son Cormac by using his best endeavours to restore him to the throne of his ancestors. Thus prepared, Tadhg marched with his forces into Meath, and came up with the army of the usurper at Crinna, (near the place where now stand the noble ruins of the ancient abbey of Mellifont, on the bounds of Meath and Louth). Here a battle was fought in which the Ultonians were defeated by Tadhg, and Fergus the usurper and the other two Ferguses his brothers slain and beheaded.

Cormac having been thus restored to his throne gave Tadhg the promised territory, extending along the sea from the river Glais Nera, (at Dromiskin in Louth,) to the Liffey; a territory which was ever afterwards known by the name of Ciannachta, in memory of Tadhg's father Cian; and in which his descendants, (of whom the families of Mac Cormac are the representatives), continued to flourish as chiefs down to the tenth century, when they were at last reduced by the Danes.

Tadhg's second son, Cormac, had received the surname of Gaileng, (Cormac Gaileng, that is, Cormac "Shame-spear"), from having on a certain occasion made a treacherous use of the favourite spear of his father. And it is from this Cormac and his descendants that the territory of the Great and Little Gailengas (in Meath), as well as of Luighné (or Lunc or Lency, in Meath and Sligo,) derive their names; and it is from him that the families of O'Lothchain in Meath, and O'Hara and O'Gara in Sligo, descend. From Conla, the elder son of Tadhg, sprang all the O'Carrolls, O'Reardons, and O'Meachars of Tipperary; and of his race too was the celebrated poet and scholar Flann, professor in the ancient abbey of Monasterboice, in Louth, of whom I shall have more to say hereafter.

Poems by
Cuan
O'Lothchain.

Of Cuan O'Lothchain's works I have met with but six historical poems, but these are all of great value.

The first is a poem of forty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and eighty-eight lines, in praise of the monarch Cormac Mac Airt, who died A.D. 266; describing by name and situation every chief building and monument, every remarkable spot and object, within the precincts of Tara, in Cormac's time or added afterwards; and not only those then remaining in ruins, but all those described in writings from the time of Cormac down to his own. This poem, with an English translation, (and a map of the ruins of Tara, deduced from it), is printed in Dr. Petrie's History and Antiquities of Tara, published in the year 1839, in the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, (vol. xviii. part ii.); a work to which I would direct the special attention of all who feel any interest in the genuine investigation of the antiquities of Ireland. As Dr. Petrie's published version of this most curious and important poem, and my own analysis of it in a former Lecture,<sup>(106)</sup> are already before the public, it is not necessary that I should dwell on it further here.

LECT. VII.
Poems by Cuan
O'Lothchain.

The second piece of O'Lothchain is a poem of thirty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and forty-eight lines, on the peculiar privileges and prerogatives, as well as restrictions and prohibitions, of the monarch and provincial kings of Erin. According to this poem, the monarch was subject to seven "prohibitions", and had seven prerogatives, and each of the four provincial kings had five of each. The origin of those prohibitions (which are very analogous to those of our modern "lucky" and "unlucky" days), is lost in the obscurity of ages; but doubtless they had their rise in some untoward accidents or events which were at the time of sufficient importance to be handed down in warning traditions to generations long subsequent.

The "prohibitions" of the monarch of Erin were such as the following: He should not let the sun rise upon him in his bed in the plain of Tara; he should not alight on a Wednesday in the plain of Bregia; he should not traverse the plain of Cuillenn after sunset; he should not urge his horse on the slope of Comar; he should not launch his ship on the Monday next after May-day; and he should not leave the track of his army on the plain of Maigin on the Tuesday next after All Hallows.

His seven "prerogatives" were: To be supplied with the fish of the river Boyne to eat; the deer of Luibnech; the fruit of Manann, (the present Isle of Man); the heath-fruit of Bri-Leith; the cresses of the river Brosnach; the water of the well of Tlachtga; the hares of Naas. It was on the calends of August all these were brought to the king of Temair (Tara). And by way of a blessing on the king, it was said that the year in which he eat of these did not count in his age, and he defeated his foes on all sides.

The "prohibitions" and "prerogatives" of the provincial kings were of the same character as these; but, as they are published in the Book of Rights, already mentioned, I shall pass them over here.

From the opening lines of the poem it would appear to have

<sup>(106)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; pp. 9, 10; and APP., p. 496.

LECT. VII.

Poems by Cuan
O'Lothchain.

been addressed to the door-keeper of King Malachy the Second, who first assumed the monarchy in the year 979; and it seems that the object of the poet was to introduce himself to the notice of the monarch for the purpose of being chosen by him as chief poet; but whether he was successful in this object or not, we have now no means of knowing. The poem begins: <sup>(107)</sup>

"O noble man who closest the door!
I am O'Lothchain of the poems.
Allow me to pass by thee into the strong house
In which is the high monarch of Erin.

"With me for him will be found
The knowledge—which is not a fiction—
Of his seven prerogatives of many virtues,
With the seven prohibitions of the high king".

In the last stanza but one we have a confirmation of what was stated in a former Lecture, that an accurate knowledge of these prerogatives and prohibitions was indispensable to the candidate who sought the distinction of Ollamh or chief poet and historian,—either to the monarch or to any of the provincial kings,—or to a free visitation of their provinces. This stanza is as follows:

"He is not entitled to the free visitation of a province,
Nor to the Ollamh-ship of Erin,
Nor almost to anything he asks,—
The poet with whom these are not found".

The third piece of O'Lothchain's composition is a poem of sixteen stanzas, or fifty-six lines, on the origin of the name of the Sinann, now the river Shannon. This poem begins:

"The noble name of Sinainn seek ye from me;
Its bare recital would not be pleasant,
Not alike now are its action and noise
As when Sinann herself was free and alive". <sup>(108)</sup>

Legend of the origin of the name of the river
Sinann, (Shannon).

The legend of the Shannon's origin affords an interesting example of the style of our very ancient literary compositions. It is shortly as follows:

Sinann was the daughter of the learned Lodan, who was the son of Lear, the great sea-king of the Tuatha Dé Danann colony of Erin, from whose son and successor Manannan the <sup>(107)</sup> See Leabhar na g-Ceart (Book of Rights), published by the Celtic Society, 1848; p. 9.

<sup>(108)</sup> original:—*Saep ainm Sinna raigúir uaim naoao loino a lom luair
in h-inano a gnim ra gléo via mbaí Sinano co saep beo.*

Isle of Man derives its name and ancient celebrity.<sup>(109)</sup> In those very early times there was a certain mystical fountain which was called Connla's Well, (situated, so far as we can gather, in Lower Ormond). As to who this Connla was, from whom the well had its name, we are not told; but the well itself appears to have been regarded as another Helicon by the ancient Irish poets. Over this well there grew, according to the legend, nine beautiful mystical hazle-trees, which annually sent forth their blossoms and fruits simultaneously. The nuts were of the richest crimson colour, and teemed with the knowledge of all that was refined in literature, poetry, and art. No sooner, however, were the beautiful nuts produced on the trees, than they always dropped into the well, raising by their fall a succession of shining red bubbles. Now during this time the water was always full of salmon; and no sooner did the bubbles appear than these salmon darted to the surface and eat the nuts, after which they made their way to the river. The eating of the nuts produced brilliant crimson spots on the bellies of these salmon; and to catch and eat these salmon became an object of more than mere gastronomic interest among those who were anxious to become distinguished in the arts and in literature without being at the pains and delay of long study; for the fish was supposed to have become filled with the knowledge which was contained in the nuts, which, it was believed, would be transferred in full to those who had the good fortune to catch and eat them. Such a salmon was, on that account, called the Eo Feasa, or "Salmon of Knowledge"; and it is to such a salmon that we sometimes meet a reference among our old poets, where, when speaking of objects which they pretend to be above description, they say, "unless they had eaten of the salmon of knowledge they could not do it justice".

Thus Mac Liag in the poem on Tadhg O'Kelly, who was killed in the battle of Clontarf, and whose body was laid on the shields of his clan, the warrior chiefs of Ui Mainé:—

"I am not able to describe their shields,—

But the vultures are joyful through their means;

Unless I had eaten the Salmon of Knowledge,

I never could accomplish it".<sup>(110)</sup>

And thus again Aengus Finn (or the Fair) O'Daly, popularly called Aengus-na-Diadhachta, ("of the Divinity"), and who flourished about the year 1400, applies this term to the

Mac Liag alludes to the "Salmon of Knowledge"; (the Eo Feasa).

Allusion to the Eo Feasa by Aengus Finn O'Daly (A.D. 1400.)

(109) See "Note on Manannan Mac Lir", ATLANTIS, vol. iv. p. 226.

(110) original:—ní tís oimh aipeam a ríat ácc ar fáilrú piach dá fáit muna éatáim in t-éó fíir, ní férfaimh beach nír co bpiach.

LECT. VII. Blessed Virgin Mary, in one of his many hymns to her praise, which begins:

"Often is a kinswoman espoused", etc.<sup>(111)</sup>

The following is the fourth stanza of this graceful poem:

"Mary is not like unto ordinary women,

In regard to the love that I have contracted with her:

I assert that no cloud ever obscures

The Salmon of Knowledge through whom God became man".<sup>(112)</sup>

To proceed, however, with the legend of the Shannon:

It was forbidden to women to come within the precincts of Connla's wonderful well; but the beautiful lady Sinann, who possessed above every maiden of her time all the accomplishments of her sex, longed to have also those more solid and masculine acquirements which were accessible at Connla's well to the other sex only. To possess herself of these she went secretly to the mystical fountain; but as soon as she approached its brink, the waters rose up violently, burst forth over its banks, and rushed towards the great river now called the Shannon, overwhelming the lady Sinann in their course, whose dead body was carried down by the torrent, and at last cast up on the land at the confluence of the two streams. After this the well became dry for ever; and the stream which issued from it was that originally known by the name of the lady Sinann or Shannon; but having fallen into that great succession of lakes which runs nearly through the centre of Ireland, the course of lakes subsequently appropriated the name to itself, which it still retains, whilst the original stream is now unknown. The original Sinann is, however, believed to have fallen into the present Shannon, near the head of Loch Dearg, not far from Portumna.

Legendary tradition of the Seven Streams of the Fountain of Connla.

According to legendary tradition, there were seven secret streams of knowledge flowing from Connla's sacred fountain; among which were the rivers now known as the Boyne, the Suir, the Nore, the Barrow, and the Slaney. And it is in allusion to this tradition that Cormac Mac Chuillennain, in a poem written by him a short time before his death, says, that he found his "nut of knowledge on the waters of the river Barrow"; for it was at Disert Diarmada, (now Castle Dermot, near that river, in the county of Kildare), that he studied in his youth.

<sup>(111)</sup> original:—Memic beasair bean gaol.

<sup>(112)</sup> original:—*ní corhaíl muine ir na mná
pán cumann do punnear nía bim rir ndé ar cuinnig céo an t-éó rir or uinnig oia.*

This then is the ancient legend which Cuan O'Lothchain has handed down to us. LECT. VII.

Edward O'Reilly, in his "Irish Writers", at the year 1024, makes a short mention of these three poems of O'Lothchain's; but of the following poems he appears to have known nothing. Poems by
*Cuan
O'Lothchain*,
(continued).

The fourth piece of O'Lothchain's composition is a poem of fifty-three stanzas, or two hundred and twelve lines, on the origin of the name and the ancient history of the Hill of Druim Criaich, (now Drum Cree, in the parish of Kileumney, barony of Delvin, and county of Westmeath). This poem begins:

"Druim Criaich! meeting-place of an hundred hosts!

Though now a desert, thy fame fades not,

Though thou art now Druim Criaich, thou wert once
also Druim-Cro;

As well as the cold Druim Airthir on the same day".<sup>(113)</sup>

Druim Criaich, the first of these three names, is composed of druim, a hill, and criaich; which is composed of cri, the heart, and ach, a sigh or moan; because, ever after the monarch Eochaidh Feidhlech received the heads of his three rebellious sons on this hill, sighs and moans never ceased to issue from his heart. Druim Cro, the second name, means the Gory Hill; from all the blood that was shed there on the day of the great battle. Druim Airthir, the third name, means simply the Eastern Hill; doubtless in reference to some other remarkable hill which must have stood to the west of it. The story told in the poem is shortly this:

Eochaidh Feidhlech was monarch of Erin about a century before the Incarnation. Besides the celebrated Medhbh (or Meave,) queen of Connacht, and other daughters, he had three sons, born at one birth, who were named Lothur, Nor, and Breas, and who are better known in Irish history by the names of the Tri Finn Eamhna, or the Three Fair Twins, (or Triplets). When these sons grew to man's estate, they became impatient of their father's rule, and proposed to dethrone him and seize on the sovereignty for themselves. For this purpose they mustered a large force of adherents at Emania, in Ulster, where they had been educated, and marched through the northern province westwards to Eas-ruadh, (Easroc,—Ballyshannon), and Sligo, and from that to Rath Cruachain (in Roscommon), to Athlone, and so across the Shannon (into Westmeath). Their father in the meantime having received information, at Tara, of History of
Druim Criaich; (temp. Eochaidh Feidh-lech, circa
B.C. 100.)

<sup>(113)</sup> original:—Drúim críach céte cét cuan
cencop [ceppa—Lecain] oiteub m ombuan cio drúim críach ba drúim crí
ir drúim nuair nairéir m den ló.

LECT. VII.

their movements and designs, hurriedly collected such forces as time would allow, and marching at their head to meet his unnatural enemies, encamped on Druim Airthir, to watch their progress and await their arrival. The young princes learning this movement, advanced directly to the king's camp, and a fierce battle immediately succeeded, in which they were entirely defeated, and forced to fly westwards across the Shannon. In this flight they were overtaken, made prisoners, and beheaded; and their three heads were carried back to their father, whose heart however never after ceased to lament over their loss, and their and his own misfortunes.

History of the Cath
Atha Comair.

By those who feel an interest in the authenticity of ancient Irish history, and the class of native original documents upon which it is mainly founded, this poem will be regarded as a document of deep importance. The details to be sure are not many, and the topography of the march of the king's rebellious sons is scanty; yet still are they most valuable, because they afford strong evidence of the antiquity, and, as I am convinced, the authenticity, of a detailed prose version of this historical transaction which is still extant, though in a very corrupted form as to language, under the title of Cath Atha Comair, (or the battle of the Ford of Comar), the only copy of which that I am acquainted with is preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, in the handwriting of John Mac Solly of the county of Meath, copied by him in the year 1715.

The poetic history of Druim Criaich, however, is continued to a period far later than that which forms the subject of the prose tract, coming down indeed to the time of the poet himself. The circumstances of the later transactions recorded in it are not sufficiently detailed in this poem, nor are they preserved in the Annals of the Four Masters. It appears that from some cause, which is not explained, Domhnall the son of Donnchadh (or Donogh), son of Flann Sinna, monarch of Erin, (who died in the year 914), was driven out from Tara, the patrimony of his ancestors; that in his difficulty, accompanied by only three followers, he took a prey from O'Duban of Druim Dairbreach, in the neighbourhood of Druim Criaich; that he was pursued and overtaken at the latter hill by O'Duban, accompanied by nine men; that a fight took place between them on the hill, in which O'Duban was slain; that he was buried on the spot; and that his tomb was erected there by his vanquisher, to be preserved for after ages as a memorial of the victory. This Domhnall was father of the celebrated monarch Maelseachlainn, (or Malachy), who died in the year 1022; and his pedigree, a very valuable piece of history, is preserved here, being carried up through thirty generations to the above-named monarch LECT VII.

Eochaidh Feidhlech.

There is a fine copy of this poem preserved in the Book of Leinster; and it is also to be found in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, but without the author's name, and wanting also the twenty-three last stanzas which record the second battle of Druim Criaich.

The fifth piece of Cuan O'Lothchain's composition is a poem of eighty-one stanzas, or three hundred and twenty-four lines, in praise of ancient Tara, and of the person, prowess, and life of Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Erin, who was slain in France A. D. 405. The poet gives a graphic account of the birth, education, and succession to the throne of his father, of the celebrated Niall.

Poems by
Cuan
O'Lothchain
 (continued).

Niall's mother was a Scottish princess who had been taken captive by his father Eochaidh, whose "married queen" was Mongfinn, a South-Munster princess, by whom he had several sons older than Niall. When Niall was born, we are here told, the jealous queen had him conveyed out of the palace of Tara and exposed on the green side of the hill, where he was taken up by the celebrated Munster poet Torna Eigeas, the same of whom we had occasion to speak in a former Lecture. Torna took him home to his residence in Kerry, where he nurtured and educated him, and afterwards brought him to Tara and presented him to his father and his friends. The beauty and promise of the youth at once found favour with his father; and on comparing his appearance with that of his four elder brothers, the comparison was entirely in his favour. Now the king looking for some chance opportunity to try the comparative temper and bravery of his sons, it so happened that one day he found them all together in the forge of his chief smith; upon which he set fire to the building, and called upon his sons to save the smith's property. Immediately Brian, the eldest, rushed out with the smith's chariot, which happened to be in the forge; Ailill, the second son, carried out the smith's shield and sword; Fiachra, the third son, took out the forge trough; Fergus, the fourth son, took out a bundle of fire-wood; but Niall carried out the bellows, the sledges, the anvil, and the anvil-block. The story proceeds to recount, that when the old king saw that each of his elder sons had shunned the danger as much as he could, and ventured on saving but the lighter articles of the smith's property, while Niall seemed not to see danger at all, and chose the weightier and more important articles, he immediately made up his mind to adopt him as his successor. The other sons, either really feeling his superiority, or in obedience

History of Niall "of the Nine Hostages".

LECT. VII. to the general voice, quietly assented; and thus did Niall, though the youngest of all, succeed his father in that monarchy on which he shed a lustre that has not faded from the page of Irish history even to this day.

The only copy of this fine old poem that I have seen, is preserved in the Book of Leinster, and begins:

“Teamair of Bregia, home of the brave;

Desert is thy state; it was God that brought thee low;

The inheritance of Niall, so well worthy of thee;

The noble great mansions of the Sons of Milesius.”<sup>(110)</sup>

The sixth and last piece of Cuan O’Lothchain’s composition that I have met, is a poem of fifty-eight stanzas, or two hundred and thirty-two lines, on the ancient history of the Hill of Taillén, (now Teltown, in Meath,) and the institution of its ancient games and sports, from the destruction of the Firbolg power, in the battle of Magh Tuiredh, down to the last great fair held there by Donnchadh, or Donagh, the son of Flann Sionna, king of Meath, who died in the year 942.

Origin of the Fair of Taillén.

The origin of the name of Taillén (now Teltown), is shortly this. Eochaidh Mac Erc was king of the Firbolgs in Erin when the Tuatha Dé Danann colony arrived; and it was he that headed the former against the latter in the great battle of the southern Magh Tuiredh, in which he was slain and his people all cut off or routed. This king Eochaidh had to his queen Taillté, the daughter of Magh Mór, “king of Spain”; and she had been the fostermother and tutoress of Lug, son of Cian, the most valorous and talented of the Tuatha Dé Danann, who, in due time, after the triumph of his own people, became king of Erin, and held his court chiefly at Nás, (now Naas, in the present county of Kildare). It was during his reign that his fostermother, Taillté, died; and he buried her in a plain (in the present barony of Kells, in the county of Meath;) where he raised over her a large artificial hill or sepulchral mound, which remains to this day; and where he ordered a commemorative festival, with games and sports after the fashion of other countries, to be held in her honour for ever. These sports were appointed to commence each year in the middle of July, and end in the middle of August.

But as the matter of this important poem does not come within the scope of the present course of Lectures, and as its details will form part of, if not a whole Lecture, in another

<sup>(110)</sup> original.—*Teamair breg baile na rian, poroe dail oia na domno,
oilec neill mac cubaio cell,
minler mop mac mileo.*

section of our National History, I shall pass it by for the LECT. VII.
present with this brief notice. For sake of identification, however, I may quote the first verse, which begins,

“You learned men of the land of brave Conn,
Listen to me awhile, and take my blessing,
Until I relate to you the ancient history
Of the institution and arrangement of the fair of Tailtén”.<sup>(115)</sup>

The beautiful copy of this poem preserved in the Book of Leinster contains fifty-eight stanzas; while the copies of it preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain consist of but forty-three, and want the author's name.

I have now brought down my list of the chief professors of the ancient Irish Schools of Learning, almost as far as I need continue it for the purpose of the present Lectures, the illustration of the proofs of our ancient national civilization. I shall only add one other name, but it is one upon which I have still something to say, although in a former Lecture I had occasion to speak of this great teacher and historian in reference to his authority respecting the facts and chronology of our ancient history; I allude to the next great historical poet, in order of time, after O'Lothchain;—I mean Flann Mainistrech, or “of Monasterboice”, as he is commonly called;—Flann, the chief professor or head master of the great lay school at the monastery of Saint Buité, (now called Monasterboice, in the present county of Louth),—who died in the year 1056. Of Flann of Monaster-
boice.

I have in a former Lecture given a somewhat detailed account of the historical synchronisms compiled by this celebrated scholar;<sup>(116)</sup> but, besides these, he has left us a vast quantity of valuable contributions to the illustration of our history, as well as specimens of the cultivation of the native language of Erin in his time.

Flann of the Monastery, as he is popularly called, was, like Cuan O'Lothchain, of Munster extraction, and descended from the same ancestor,—Tadhg, the son of Cian, son of Oilioll Oluin,—but through a different line from the O'Lothchains; and he was not the only distinguished scholar of his immediate family.<sup>(117)</sup>

(115) original :—*a choema épiche Chumro cám, ceitro bic ar bennaétam,
co n-veiciur ouib penéur pen,
ruoiéte oenaié tailten.*

(116) See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 53.

(117) See the Genealogical Table appended to the “Battle of Mugh Léna”;—published, with an English translation and notes, by the Celtic Society, in the year 1855.

LECT. VII.

Poems of *Flann Main-
istrech.*

Of Flann Mainistrech's historical poems, those comprised in the following list are preserved in the Book of Leinster, which was compiled in less than a century after his death.

The first is a poem of forty stanzas, or one hundred and sixty lines, on the manner of death and place of sepulture of the most distinguished persons, male and female, of the ancient Tuatha Dé Danann colony of Erin. This poem, of which there is a copy also in the Book of Lecain, begins:

"Listen, O ye learned! without blemish".<sup>(118)</sup>

The second is a poem of thirty-seven stanzas, or one hundred and forty-eight lines, giving the length of the reigns and the manner of death of the Pagan monarchs of Erin, from Eochaidh Feidhlech, in the century before the Incarnation, down to Dathi, the last of the Pagan rulers, who died "at the foot of the Alps", A. D. 428. This poem, of which there is also a copy preserved in the Book of Lecain, begins:

"The kings of Teamar, who were warmed by fire".<sup>(119)</sup>

The third is a poem of fifty-two stanzas, or two hundred and eight lines, giving the names and manner of deaths of the Christian monarchs of Erin, from Jaeghairé, who began his reign 428, to Maelseachluinn or Malachy the Second, who died 1022. This poem, of which the Book of Lecain also contains a copy, begins:

"The powerful kings of Teamar afterwards".<sup>(120)</sup>

These three poems are described by Edward O'Reilly in his "Irish Writers", at the year 1056; but with the following ten poems he appears to have been unacquainted, nor are they found in any other book that I am aware of, but the Book of Leinster alone, excepting two which shall presently be observed on.

The fourth is a poem of twenty-six stanzas, or one hundred and four lines, on the names of the persons who composed the Tróm Dáimh, or Great Company, of Poets, pupils, women, and attendants, which accompanied the chief poet Seanchan Torpest on his visit to the court of Guairé, king of Connacht, at Durlas, in that province, some time about the year 600, a visit which has been described in a former lecture.<sup>(121)</sup> It is difficult to discover what could have been the object of the author in writing this poem, unless we take it to have been a display of his rhythmical powers; for it contains no real name or useful fact, but consists chiefly of a harsh collection of fanciful descriptive names,

<sup>(118)</sup> original:—Éiricig a cóileá cen ón.

<sup>(119)</sup> original:—Rig terna dia tearbann tnu.

<sup>(120)</sup> original:—Rig terna taebaiße isptain.

<sup>(121)</sup> See Ante, LECT. iv.; p. 87.

set down in good rhyme, but in tiresome alliteration. This poem, which appears to have been addressed to one of the author's pupils, begins:

LECT. VII.
Poems of Flann Main-
istrech.

"Thou youth of many high degrees,
Among the crowd of learned assemblies,
What were the names,—relate to us,—
Of the people of the Great Company."<sup>(122)</sup>

The fifth is a poem of fifteen stanzas, or sixty lines, on the names, length of reign, and manner of death, of the Christian kings of Munster, from Ængus, son of Natfraech, (who, with his wife, was killed in the battle of Cell Osnadh, [in Carlow,] in the year 489,) down to Donnchadh, (or Donagh,) son of Brian Boromha, who succeeded to the government of Munster about the year 1023. This important poem begins:

"Are ye acquainted with the ancient history."<sup>(123)</sup>

The sixth is a poem of fifty-one stanzas, or two hundred and four lines, chiefly on the monarchs of Erin and kings of Meath who descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages;—from Conall Cremthainné, son of Niall, (the first king of Meath separately and as distinguished from the monarchy,) down to Conchobhar, king of Meath, who was slain by his kinsman Morogh the son of Flann O'Maelseachlainn, about the year 1030. This poem gives the name, length of reign, and manner of death, of each of these kings, forty-seven in number, and begins:

"Meath, the home of the race of Conn,—
The beautiful seat of brave Niall's sons,—
The heart of far-renowned Erin;
Meath, the plain of the great marshalled troops."<sup>(124)</sup>

The seventh is an interesting poem of thirty-five stanzas, or one hundred and forty lines, on the origin and history of the ancient Palace of Aileach, (near Derry; in the present county of Donegal). The origin of this celebrated palace, according to this account of it (containing a specimen of poetic etymology which I only quote for what it is worth), was shortly this:

When the Great Daghdá was chief king of the Tuatha Dé Danann in Erin, holding his court at Tara, he on one occasion entertained at his court Corrgenn, a powerful Connacht

Origin of the Palace of Aileach.

<sup>(122)</sup> original:—Δ ἕλλα ἄνθρωποι n-ιγνάδα,
ετερ ὀρunga ὀρongs ὠάλα,
κα δέ ατ ἀνμάνω uncróe,
muntipe na tptom ὠάμα.

<sup>(123)</sup> original:—in éol oib in reñcúr ren.

<sup>(124)</sup> original:—míre maigen élainne cumo,
cáin fóroo clainne neill neapc-lumt,
crúe banba brúce,
míre maḡ na moḡ crúe.

LECT. VII.

Origin of the Palace of
Aileach.

chief, and his wife. During their stay at Teamair, Corrgenn's wife was suspected of being more familiar with the monarch's young son Aedh, (or Hugh) than was pleasing to her husband, who in a fit of sudden anger slew the young prince in the very presence of his father. Corrgenn's life would have paid for the murder on the spot, but that the old monarch's sense of justice was too strong to kill a man for avenging a crime so heinous as he believed his son to have been guilty of; but, although he would not consent to have his guest put directly to death, he passed on him such a sentence as, whether he intended it so or not, ended in the same manner. The singular sentence which the king passed on the unfortunate Corrgenn was, (according to the story,) to take the dead body of the prince on his back, and never to lay it down until he had found a stone exactly to fit him in length and breadth, and sufficient to form a tomb-stone for him; and then to bury him in the nearest hill. Corrgenn was obliged to submit, and accordingly set out with his burden. After a long search he found at last the stone he sought for, but found it only so far off as by the shore of Loch Feabhail, (now called Loch Foyle, at Derry.) Here, then, depositing the body on the nearest eminence to him, he went down, raised the stone, and carried it up to the hill, where he dug a grave, and buried the prince; and with many an ach (or groan) placed the stone over him; but, wearied by his labour, he had hardly done so before he dropped down dead by its side. And it was from these achs or groans of Corrgenn, that, (compounding the word ach with ail, an ancient Gaelic name for a stone,) the old monarch, when informed of what had happened, formed the name of Ail-ach for his son's grave; that is stone and groan; a name that the place has ever since retained. It was the custom in ancient times in Erin, when a great personage had died, to institute assemblies and games of commemoration at his grave; and this was done at his son's grave at Aileach by the monarch Daghda.

The poem, however, contains two further explanations of the name of Aileach. In some time after the death of Corrgenn, it is said, Neid, son of Indai, (a semi-mythological personage, who may be called the Mercury of the Tuatha Dé Danann,) brother to the monarch the Daghda, built a palace and fortress here, after which it was called Aileach Neid. Neid was himself afterwards killed by the Fomorians or Pirates; and the place having gone to ruin, its history is not recorded from that time down to the reign of the monarch of Erin Fiacha Sraibhtiné, who was slain at the battle of Dubh-Chomar, A. D. 322. In this Fiacha's reign, however, it is stated that Frigrinn, a young Scottish chief, eloped with Aileach, "that is, 'the splendid'", daughter of Fubtainé, the king of Scotland; brought her over to Erin; and put himself under the Irish king's protection. And it is said that King Fiacha gave the youthful lovers the ancient fortress of Aileach for their residence and security; and that here Frigrinn built the magnificent house which is described in this poem, whence the place got the name of Aileach Frigrinn, as well as the older name of Aileach Neid.

LECT. VII.

Origin of the Palace of Aileach.

Flann's curious poem begins:

"Should any one attempt to relate

The history of host-crowded Aileach,

After Eochaidh the illustrious,—

It would be wresting the sword out of Hector's hand".<sup>(125)</sup>

I must observe here, however, that the ancient name of Aileach was certainly Aileach Neid; and the investigations of antiquaries, (including the cautious Dr. Petrie,) have led to the same conclusion to which we should come by following the ancient manuscript authorities,—that the stone ruins at Aileach, as well as several other similar stone erections in several parts of Erin, must be referred to the Tuatha Dé Danann, if not to the Firbolgs; certainly to a race prior to the Milesians. A simpler etymology may easily be suggested for the name; for when we remember that the Milesians always used wooden buildings, in preference to the stone used by their predecessors, we can easily understand why they should emphasize such an erection under the name of Aileach. The word aileach itself may in fact signify simply "a stone building"; since ail is a stone, and ach the common adjective termination; so that aileach would literally signify "stony", i.e. of or belonging to, or made of, stone.

Who the Eochaidh was to whom Flann refers as having already written copiously of the history of Aileach, I cannot with certainty say; but I believe him to have been Flann's own contemporary, Eochaidh (called the "Learned") O'Ceirin; and that he was the author of the long poem on Aileach, preserved in the Book of Lecain, and published (with an English translation) by Dr. Petrie, in 1837, in the Ordnance Memoir of Derry. I believe that this very poem was the "copious history" to which Flann bears such honourable testimony; and this belief is the more likely to be well-founded, when we find that the

(125) original—Cia tuallaio neó airneir reócair aileig e alcaig
o'eir caótaich áin,
is gait a clóioib allaim hectáir.

LECT. VII.

Origin of the Palace of
Aileach.

author of this long poem states, in the sixty-seventh stanza, (the last but eight), that the monarch of Erin then reigning was the sixteenth of the Clanna Neil line who had arrived at this high distinction; for we very well know that Domhnall O'Neil, grandson of Niall "Glundubh", was the sixteenth monarch of his line, and that he died and was buried at Armagh in the year 978. That the long poem on Aileach was written in the reign of Domhnall O'Neil is, therefore, pretty plain; but the author, whoever he may have been, does not set himself down as the chief author of the ancient history of that celebrated place, but quotes Cuaradh, some still more ancient writer of whom I have no other record, as the original compiler of its Dinnseanchas, or etymological history.

Of this short poem of Flann's, on Aileach, there are copies preserved in the Books of Ballymote and Lecain, in the Royal Irish Academy.

Poems of
Flann,
(continued).

The eighth poem of Flann's is one of thirty-four stanzas, or one hundred and thirty-six lines, also on Aileach, and apparently a continuation of its history, from his former poem. It gives the names, and the lengths of the reigns of every king of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, who reigned in it as king of the northern O'Neills, from Eoghan himself down to the Domhnall O'Neil mentioned above, who died in the year 978. This poem begins:

"Four generations after Frigrinn,
By valiant battle,
The noble Aileach was taken by the warriors
Of the hosts of Eoghan".<sup>(126)</sup>

The Eoghan mentioned here, whose clann took possession of Aileach under compact with his other brothers, was Eoghan the son of Niall "of the Nine Hostages", who gave name to the territory which ever after bore his name, as Tir Eoghain, (or Tyrone; a name, however, now applied to a more limited district.) This Eoghan was visited at his palace of Aileach by Saint Patrick, when he embraced the Christian faith, and received baptism at the hands of the great apostle.

It would be difficult to discover the reason which induced Flann to write these two poems, so closely trenching on the poet Eochaidh's history of Aileach, to the value of which he bears such honourable witness, were it not that we know that it was part of Flann's system of teaching, as well as of all other teachers in

<sup>(126)</sup> original :—Cinn ceithr n-omr iar Frigrinn, forraig gleógal,
ailec asmar no gab amrae,
apre eogam.

this country, to throw their lessons of history into poems of easy measure and rhyme, in order that their immediate pupils might with greater facility commit it to memory. LECT. VII.

There is another very ancient poem on the origin of Aileach preserved in the Book of Leinster, but without any author's name, and agreeing exactly with the history of the place given in the published poem, as well as in Flann's. This poem comes down, however, but to the time of its passing into the possession of Eoghan, son of Niall; Saint Patrick's visit to him there; and the blessing which he left upon Eoghan and his descendants. It is probably Cuaradh's poem, referred to in Eochaidh's longer composition. The writer of this poem was evidently of the Clann Neill, as he calls Saint Colum Cille his kinsman, alludes to his mission to Scotland, and invokes his intercession for his soul. This poem consists of twenty-eight stanzas, or a hundred and twelve lines, beginning:

"Behold Aileach from all sides around!
Home of the hosts of Niall's brave race,
Mound of the assemblies of noble Erin,
Grave of Aedh, son of vehement Daghdá".<sup>(127)</sup>

The ninth poem of Flann's is one of twenty-three stanzas, or ninety-two lines, on several of the battles and deeds of valour gained and performed by the descendants of Eoghan, son of Niall,—more familiarly known by the name of the Cinel Eoghain—from the battle of Sliabh Cua, (in the County of Waterford), gained over the men of Munster in the year 593 by Fiachna, son of Baetan, king of Ulster, to the battle of Cill-nan-Daighré, (near Drogheda), gained by the Monarch Aedh Finnliath in the year 866, over Flann son of Conaing, lord of Bregia, and a great force of the men of Leinster and the Danes of Dublin, to the number of five thousand. This valuable poem begins:

"Let us follow,—it is no path of ease,—
Our history without faintness,
Until we relate, without omission,
The deeds of the race of Eoghan".<sup>(128)</sup>

The tenth poem of Flann's is one of sixty-eight stanzas, or two <sup>(127)</sup> original:—Decro ailech n-imchili n-uais, roas fluas rip-enn ril neill,

fept ro aenag banba m-bain,
aeva ain mic dagda vein.

<sup>(128)</sup> original:—Arenam ní feól fadaíl tarram ríet cen b'réobail co n-ecrem cen víoail oo gnimaib ril eogain.

Poem on Aileach, supposed to be that by Cuaradh, (10th century).

Poems of
Flann
Mainistirrech,
(continued).

LECT. VII.

POEMS OF Flann
Mainistrech
(continued).

hundred and seventy-two lines, on several other of the battles gained, and deeds of valour performed, by the Cinel Eoghain, from the above battle of Sliabh Cua, gained in the year 593, down to the battle of Magh Adhair by Mac Lochlainn, the battle of Ceann Coradh by Domhnall, and a battle over the Uli-dians by Mac Lochlainn in the end of the tenth century, in which that Donnsleibhé, king of Ulidia, was slain, whose head was carried to Armagh to be buried. The record by Flann of these three battles is the more important, as none of them is recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters. This valuable poem begins:

“What they have performed of valour,
These clans of Eoghan,
Though it be attempted it cannot be Recounted by the poets”.<sup>(129)</sup>

The eleventh poem of Flann's is one of sixty-nine stanzas, or two hundred and seventy-six lines, also on the Cinel Eoghain. This poem gives an account of the life of the celebrated Muirchertach, son of Muiredhach, son of that Eoghain from whom descend the Cinel Eoghain. He was more popularly called Muirchertach Mac Erc, after his mother, who was Erc, daughter of Loarn Mór, King of Albain, (Scotland). Muirchertach reigned as monarch of Erin twenty-four years, until he was burned to death in the palace of Cleitech, on the Boyne, in the year 527. The history of the elopement of his mother, Erc, with his father Muiredhach,—his birth, life, battles, and death,—are well described in this poem; as are also a great number of the victories of the Cinel Eoghain, down to the time of Flaithbheartach O'Neil, king of Aileach, who died in the year 1036. This most important historical poem begins:

“The deeds, the victories,
The devastations were so numerous
Of those men, so far renowned,
That even the poets cannot recount them”.<sup>(130)</sup>

It would be difficult to over-estimate the historical value of these three poems. They are precisely the documents that supply life and the reality of details to the blank dryness of our <sup>(129)</sup> original:—An vo ponrac vo éalma,

clanna Eógain,
Cia meabair ní etar,
a arim eolais.

<sup>(130)</sup> original:—a n-glúino, a n-écta,
a n-ogúí batarslú,
in fúir ír lia cupim,
connach ar cluino o píro.

skeleton pedigrees. Many a name lying dead in our genealogical tracts, and which has found its way into our evidently condensed chronicles and annals, will be found in these poems, connected with the death or associated with the brilliant deeds of some hero whose story we would not willingly lose; while, on the other hand, many an obscure historical allusion will be illustrated, and many an historical spot as yet unknown to the topographer will be identified, when a proper investigation of these and other great historical poems preserved in the Book of Leinster shall be undertaken as part of the serious study of the history and antiquities of our country.

LECTURE VIII.

[Delivered 23rd June, 1857.]

(III.) EDUCATION, AND LITERATURE; (continued). Of the Poems of Flann Mainistrech (continued). Of the History of Aedh Slainé, (Monarch, vi. century). Of some Poems of Giolla-Brighde Mac Connidhé (xiii. century), attributed by O'Reilly to Flann. Of a Poem by Eoghan Ruadh Mac an Bhaird (or Ward), attributed by O'Reilly to Flann. Of Flann's Poem on the Pedigree of the Saints of Erin. History anciently taught in verse. Of Flann and his descendants. Of general education in Erin in early times. Continued cultivation of the Gaelic, after the introduction of Latin. Of the system of Academic Education in early times. The ancient Academic or University course. Of the legal relations between Teacher and Pupil. Teachers often employed as Ministers of State by their former pupils; Fothaidh "na Canoine". The Profession of Teaching not confined to the clergy in early Christian times. Maelsuthain O'Carroll, Teacher and afterwards Secretary of Brian Boromha.

THERE remain still some poems of Flann of Monasterboice to be mentioned before I close with him the sketch I proposed to trace of the succession of distinguished scholars and teachers in the Gaelic language during the earlier ages of our history. The cultivation of our ancient language, it need hardly be observed, by no means ceased with Flann. On the contrary it continued for centuries after his time to flourish vigorously; and it was during the succeeding ages to that of Flann that the greater portion of the extensive works still existing in the Gaelic were composed. But of the chief part of these an account has been given in a former course of lectures<sup>(131)</sup> in so much detail, that for my present purpose of illustrating the early civilization of Erin, I need not repeat myself by continuing the chain below the eleventh century.

Poems of
Flann Mainistrech (continued).

The twelfth poem of Flann's, not noticed by O'Reilly, is one of fifteen stanzas, or sixty lines, on the birth and history of Aedh Slainé, (a name commonly written Hugh Slaney), son of Diarmait, monarch of Erin, who was slain in the year 558, after a reign of twenty years. This story of Aedh Slainé is as follows:

History of
Aedh Slainé, (Monarch, 6th century).

Diarmait had to his second wife Mughain, the daughter of Concraidh, king of South Munster. Now, Mughain, as it happened, had no children for several years after her marriage; and as this was always considered as a reproach to our queens in ancient times, just as to those of the Hebrews, Mughain's

(131) Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History.

life soon became an unhappy one. To cure her grief, therefore, LECT. VIII.
 the queen, with the consent of her husband, piously besought
 the prayers of two holy saints, the bishops Aedh, of Rath Aedh, (in Meath), and Finnen, of Magh-Bilé, (now Movilla, in the county of Down). And it is recorded that soon afterwards she conceived, and in due time bore a son, the above-named Aedh Slainé, who subsequently succeeded to the monarchy in the year 595, and who was slain the year 600. Flann's poem recounting this story begins:

“Mughain, the daughter of worthy Concraidh, Son of Duach, king of South Munster,
 Who followed munificence without guile,
 The wife of Diarmait Mac Cerbhail”.<sup>(132)</sup>

The thirteenth poem of Flann's is one of thirty-five stanzas, Poems of Flann Main-
istrech (continued).
 or one hundred and forty lines, composed for his pupils in history. In this poem he gives a list of the monarchs of Erin and of the kings of Meath of the race of the above Aedh Slainé; together with the length of the reign and the manner and place of death of each, down to Donnchadh, who was slain by the Clann Colman, and Muirchertach, who was slain by Maelseachlainn; both of whom must have been kings of Meath, and both of whom must have flourished down to the close of the tenth century, though their names are not found in the Annals of the Four Masters. This valuable poem begins:

“The race of Aedh Slainé of the Spears,
 Of whom grew many noble kings,
 I will relate of their actions good,
 Their deaths, and their lordly reigns”.<sup>(133)</sup>

This is the last of the thirteen poems of Flann Mainistrech preserved in the Book of Leinster; but of the following list of poems, in addition to those already noticed, printed by O'Reilly and ascribed to him, some are genuine and some are not, as I shall now proceed to show.

The fourth poem of Flann's in O'Reilly's list is one of thirty-three stanzas, or one hundred and thirty-two lines, on the family or household of Saint Patrick; in which the name and office of each person, male and female, are given; such as, his chaplains; his judges; his advisers; his workers in gold, silver,

<sup>(132)</sup> original:—Mughain ingen Chonchraio éain,
mic Duac do deir-Mumain,
ro éirem rialganta cen failt,
bean Diarmata mic Cerbhail.

<sup>(133)</sup> original:—Sil aera Slaine na fleá,
diar aradar mor ius na gel,
innisfet ara maithur,
a n-aidet, a n-apoflathur.

LECT. VIII.

Poems of Flann Mat-istrech (continued).

bronze, and iron; his embroidresses; his chariot-drivers, etc. etc.; and among the rest, singularly enough, appears the name of Aedh, the keeper of his Tooth, a relic which was after his death preserved in the church of Achadh Abhall, (or the "apple-tree field"), in Connacht, and the curious ancient shrine of which is now in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy. The only ancient copy of this curious poem of Flann's, that I have ever seen, is preserved in the Book of Lecain, and begins:

"The household of Patrick of the Prayers".<sup>(133)</sup>

The fifth poem of Flann's in O'Reilly's list, is one of three hundred and five stanzas, or one thousand two hundred and twenty lines, beginning:

"Make clear my way, O God of Heaven!"<sup>(134)</sup>

In this elaborate poem, (which is also a purely educational one, and intended for his class), he gives the names and reigns of the emperors and kings of the Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, from Ninus to the Emperor Theodosius; the invasion of Britain by Constantine the Great; his adoption of the sign of the cross on his banner; his conversion; and various Christian acts of his subsequent life. The only copy of this metrical abstract of ancient universal history with which I am acquainted, is preserved in the Book of Lecain.

The sixth poem of Flann's in O'Reilly's list, is one of eighteen stanzas, or seventy-two lines, on the taxes and tributes paid to the king of Tir-Chonaill, (Tir-Connell) from the subordinate chiefs of his territory, and the stipends paid by him to them; the receiving of which stipends by them was, according to the legal customs of the time, the acknowledgment on their part of his superiority, and the earnest of their own fealty to him. This curious poem begins:

"There is here a history not trifling".<sup>(135)</sup>

The seventh poem of Flann's in O'Reilly's list is one of eighteen stanzas, or seventy-two lines, on the Rights and Privileges of the kings of Aileach, or the O'Neil line, and of the kings of Tir-Chonaill, or the O'Donnell line. It begins:

"O book! there is in thy middle

A consistent, perfect history,

For the valiant king of great Eoghan's race,

And for the king of the brave Cinel Chonaill".<sup>(136)</sup>

From this valuable poem it appears that the sovereignty of (133) original:—Mumnter patraic na pater.

(134) original:—Reirig dam a dé do nim.

(135) original:—ata punn reneur nae ruail.

(136) original:—a liubar atá ar do lár, reaneur comcubair comlán,
do rís eactac eogam uill,
ir do rís ceneoil Chonuill.

Aileach was common to the Clann Eoghain and the Clann Chonaill; and our author sets forth the tributes paid by either clann, when the king of the two races was chosen from the other, as well as when he was chosen from itself. This poem appears to have been addressed by Flann to his own Book; which Book, it would appear, or at least this part of it, he had copied from the ancient book of Cill-Mic-Nenain, the principal and patron church of Tir-Connell. In the last stanza of this poem, Flann avows himself as the author of it.

LECT. VIII.

Poems of *Flann Mat-
istrech* (continued).

The eighth poem of Flann's, given in O'Reilly's list, is one of fifty-eight stanzas, or two hundred and thirty-two lines, chiefly in praise of Conall Gulban, the ancestor of the O'Donnells and all the Cinel Chonaill, who conquered from the Clann Colla and the tribes of North Connacht a territory for himself and his brothers, Cairbré, Enna, and Eoghan. Conall, it appears, was induced to go on this expedition during his father's lifetime and against the will of the king, because the northerns had slain his tutor, Fiacha, who was a Connacht-man. His father, Niall "of the Nine Hostages", prevailed on his three other sons, Conall Cremhthaimné, Fiachra, and Muiné, not to join their brother Conall in what at first appeared to him to be a wild enterprise; and in order the more to encourage them in withholding their countenance from their brother, he gave them all lands in Meath. There, accordingly, Conall Cremhthaimné became the founder of the great line of monarchs and kings of Meath of the O'Maelseachluinn line; there, also, from Fiacha descended the Mac Eochagans, O'Mulloys, and others; and from Mainé the O'Cethernaighs of Teffia, (who earned the name of Foxes), and various other families in Westmeath and Longford. These several clanns in aftertimes became distinguished in Irish History as the "Southern Hy-Niall", while the descendants of the northern brothers, (Conall Gulban, and Eoghan), are known as the "Northern Hy-Niall". The boundaries of the territories of the northern brothers are distinctly laid down in this valuable poem, which contains, besides, many other curious historical references. It begins:

"Conall, the chief of the sons of Niall, Went forth from Tara's pleasant hill,
To wreak his vengeance on the northern land,
In the province of Ulster of the red weapons".<sup>(127)</sup>

It is stated in the concluding stanza of this poem that it was

(127) original:—*Conall cuimrú éloinne néill, táinig a tampaig taobh-péir, d'aite a fálaíó 'ra tír tuair,
a ccuigeaó ulao armpuair.*

LECT. VIII. written in Monasterboice, by Ængus and Flann; but of the Ængus here mentioned we have no particulars.

Of some poems of Giolla-Brighde Mac Conmidhé, (13th century), attributed by O'Reilly to Flann.

Edward O'Reilly says that there is another poem on this subject, and beginning with the same words, written by Giolla-Brighde Mac Conmidhé, of whom he gives some account in his "Irish Writers", under the year 1350. O'Reilly is not altogether correct in this assertion. The two poems agree exactly only in the first line. Mac Conmidhé's poem recites a good deal of what is recorded by Flann of the career of Conall Gulban, and he places in a clearer light some unexplained passages in it; but the main part of it is devoted to the history and praise of Maelseachlainn O'Donnell, lord of Tir-Connell, who was slain by Maurice Fitzgerald at the battle of Eas Ruadh, (now Ballyshannon), in the year 1247. As O'Donnell's reign commenced in the year 1241, and ended in the year 1247, it is evident that Mac Conmidhé wrote this poem between these two years; and as he was also the author of several poems of an earlier date, (of one in particular, written in praise of Donnachadh Cairbrech O'Brien, who was lord of Thomond about the year 1208), it is very clear that O'Reilly is inaccurate when he makes him flourish in the year 1350. Having in my own possession fine copies of all these poems, I have no difficulty in showing their dates and where they differ.

The ninth poem ascribed to Flann in O'Reilly's list is one of thirty-one stanzas, or one hundred and twenty-four lines, on Dalach, son of Muirchertach, chief of Tir-Connell (directly descended from Conall Gulban), who was slain in the year 868. It appears from this curious poem that Muirchertach had five sons, among whom he divided his moveable property at the time of his death. Of these five sons, Dalach was the fourth, and Brodigan (from whom descend the O'Brodigans of the north), was the fifth. Dalach being more ambitious than the rest, employed the property bequeathed to him in the purchase of the succession to his father's chieftaincy from his elder brothers; and in this manner he became chief before his regular time. This Dalach was the immediate ancestor of the great O'Donnell family of Tir-Connell. This poem begins:

"Ye musical poets of Tir-Connell,

Inform us,—a matter of no small account,—

By what right did Dalach the beloved assume Chiefship over all his brethren?"<sup>(138)</sup>

(138) original:—A eoláa Conaill deoláig, fionnig úinn dáil na deoláig,
gá éirí rap gab dalac oil,
foplámar rap a bnaiteirib.

This poem, interesting as it is as an historical tract, bears internal evidence, however, from its style and diction, that it was not written by Flann of Monasterboice. The author professes in it to have obtained his historical materials from the ancient Book of Cill-Mic-Nenain, already mentioned; and he professes to quote from it a prophecy of Saint Colum Cille, concerning the reign and fame of Dalach and some of his descendants,—two of whom, Eignechan and Cathbharr, were destined to be kings of Ulster, and the other two, Conn, and another Cathbharr, were to be monarchs of Erin. Of the first two, Eignechan, the son of Dalach, succeeded his father as king of Tir-Connell, and died in the year 901. It was on his death that Mac Lonan wrote the remarkable elegy described in a former lecture. Cathbharr, the second of these destined kings of Tir-Connell, died in the year 1106; and it was under the direction and at the expense of this Cathbharr that the beautiful shrine of Saint Colum Cille's copy of the Psalms, now known as the Cathach or Book of Battles<sup>(139)</sup> (at present temporarily deposited in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy), was made. Conn and the second Cathbharr, who were, according to the supposed prophecy, promised to be monarchs of Erin, do not appear in any list of the chief kings; but I believe the Cathbharr the son of Domhnall Mór O'Donnell, who was expected to succeed his father but was killed prematurely in battle in the year 1208, was one of them. And this surmise would exactly agree with the time to which I am disposed to assign the writing of this poem, which I believe to have been written about the same time as the poem on Donnachadh Cairbrech O'Brien, and by the same author, Giolla-Brighde Mac Connmidhe. No Conn O'Donnell appears in our annals at or about this period.

The tenth poem ascribed to Flann in O'Reilly's list, is one of twelve stanzas, or forty-eight lines, beginning:

“Cairbré, Eoghan, Enda the brave,

And great Conall, the sons of Niall,

Where, O you learned of noble Erin!

Are the boundaries of their territories and lands?<sup>(140)</sup>

Edward O'Reilly, in his account of this poem, falls into a slight mistake when he says it was written on the territories of four of the sons of Conall Gulban, son of Niall “of the Nine

<sup>(139)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, pp. 327, 331; and APP., p. 598.

<sup>(140)</sup> original:—Cairbré, Eogan, Enda éirí,
ocur Conall mor mac Néill,
cairde, a éolca banba binn,
cpioca a cpioca ra fearainn.

LECT. VIII.

Of some Poems of
*Giolla-Brighde Mac
Connmidhe*, (13th century), attributed by O'Reilly to
Flann.

LECT. VIII.

Of some poems of
*Giolla-Brighde Mac
Conmidhé* (13th century), attributed by O'Reilly to
Flann.

Hostages"; it was in fact written on Conall Gulban himself, and his three brothers just mentioned, all the immediate sons of Niall. We have seen, in a former poem, that these four conquered a territory for themselves in Ulster and North Connacht, without the assent or assistance of the monarch their father; this poem professes to lay down the respective situation, limits, and boundaries of each brother's separate division of the conquered lands.

This is a curious and valuable poem; but with respect to this also it bears internal evidence that it was not from the accurate pen of Flann. Indeed there can be no reasonable doubt of its having been written by Giolla-Brighde Mac Conmidhé, and that it was one of the series of historical poems which he wrote for the northern Hy-Niall (the O'Donnells and O'Neills, etc.), in the early part of the thirteenth century. Of this I have, besides, some direct evidence; for, in a curious collection of ancient poems on the O'Donnell family and genealogy, now in my possession, Mac Conmidhé is actually set down as the author of this poem.

The eleventh poem ascribed to Flann in O'Reilly's list, is one of forty-five stanzas, or one hundred and eighty lines, beginning:

"Enna, the ward of hardy Cairbré,
Took to his share Tir-Enna of the red arms;
The chieftain left his noble sons
Under the protection of the sons of Conall".<sup>(141)</sup>

This poem, which was also written by Mac Conmidhé, and not by Flann, gives a very curious and valuable history of the territory, and of the immediate descendants of Enna, one of the three brothers of Conall Gulban, who aided him in his conquest in Ulster, and received for his share of the conquered lands a territory which after him was called Tir-Enna, or Enna's land, extending from the river Suilidh (or Swilly) westwards to the well-known mountain-pass of Bearnas Mór, in Donegal, and across from the present Lifford to Letterkenny. This is one of the most curious pieces that I am acquainted with, in relation to the immediate branching off of the Northern Hy-Niall families from the above four brothers, Conall, Eoghan, Cairbré, and Enna.

The twelfth poem ascribed to Flann in O'Reilly's list was also written by Mac Conmidhé. It is one of twenty-two stanzas,

<sup>(141)</sup> original:—*Enna dalta Cairbre éruair, no gab tiri Enna armuair, rásbair an cumraig a éloinn,
a porcáb éinrí Chonuill.*

or eighty-eight lines, and represents the discussion which is supposed to have taken place between Conall Gulban and his brother Eoghan, respecting the division of the territory which they had conquered in Ulster. This poem, which is one of no great value, begins: LECT. VIII.

“Listen ye to Conall the valiant,
And to Eoghan the noble and admirable,
How they held their council meeting
Upon the top of Drom Cruachain Hill.”<sup>(142)</sup>

The thirteenth poem ascribed to Flann by O'Reilly is merely noticed by him as commencing as follows:

“Here is a catalogue of the kings.”<sup>(143)</sup>

Of other poems attributed to Flann.

Of this poem I know nothing more than what is said here, never having met a copy of it.

The fourteenth and last poem ascribed to Flann in O'Reilly's list, is one of fourteen stanzas, or fifty-six lines, upon the baptism of Conall Gulban by St. Patrick; on which occasion the saint presented the chieftain with a shield and a crozier as symbols of the support which he was to give to the civil and ecclesiastical dignities. St. Patrick at the same time inscribed the sign of the cross on the shield with his sacred crozier, called the Staff of Jesus;<sup>(144)</sup> and he solemnly promised Conall that such of his descendants as should carry this sign in a just battle should be always victorious. And the Tir-Connellians did always inscribe this sign and the words that accompany it on their banner. The poet quotes the 137th chapter of Jocelyn's Life of St. Patrick as his authority for this story. This poem begins:

“Among all that has been written:

By the monk Jocelynus,
Of the works of Patrick, one with another,
Throughout the broad plains of Erin.”<sup>(145)</sup>

It will be seen at once, when the author of this poem quotes Jocelyn, a writer of the latter half of the twelfth century, as his authority, that that author could not have been Flann; since Flann died more than a century before that time.

(142) original:—Eirrig ne Conall calma.
ocur ne h-Cogan áro amra,
mar do pinneadap a n-dáil,
a mullaó Opoma Cruachain.

(143) original:—ata runto pullaó na pioḡ.

(144) See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 338, and APP., p. 600.

(145) original:—Eirrig gaó obair rḡmobar, an manach iocelinur,
do feartaib phataraic ceann a ceann,
ileact muig faobair eipeann.

LECT. VIII.

Neither could Mac Conmidhé have been the writer of this poem, differing as it does most remarkably from his style.

The real author of it was, in fact, Eoghan Ruadh Mac An-Bhaird, or Ward, the chaplain and faithful companion of the great Red Hugh O'Donnell, who, after the battle of Kinsale in 1602, went to Spain, where he died. I have a copy of this poem in my own possession, made by James MacGuire in the year 1727, from the book of the family poems of the O'Donnells; and in this copy, its authorship is ascribed, and I have no doubt properly, to Father Ward. The legend on which the poem is founded, however, is much older than Jocelyn, as it is preserved in the oldest copy now known of the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick.

Flann's
Poem on the Pedigrees of the Saints of Erinn.

There is another very remarkable poem, of which there is reason to believe that Flann was the author. This poem is noticed as follows in O'Reilly's "Irish Writers", at the year 908: "At the same time", he says, "with Cormac Mac Cullinan lived Sealbhach, the secretary of that prince. He wrote a poem reciting the names of the saints of Ireland, and distinguishing the tribe to which each saint belonged. It begins:

"'The sacred pedigree of the saints of Ireland'".<sup>(146)</sup>

This valuable poem is very properly described by O'Reilly, but he gives no authority to show that it was written by Sealbhach, while we have the distinct authority of the Annals of the Four Masters that it was written by Flann, for, at the year 432, the annals contain the following entry: "Ath Truim (now Trim, in Meath) was founded by St. Patrick, the place having been granted by Feidhlim, son of [the Monarch] Lae-ghairé, son of Niall, to God, to Patrick, to Loman, and to Saint Fortchern. Flann of the Monastery cecinit". And they then give the following pedigree of St. Patrick, from this poem, beginning at the eighth stanza, leaving us no room to doubt their accuracy in ascribing it to Flann:

"Patrick, Abbot, or Christian chief of all Erin,

Son of Calphrann, son of Fotidé,

Son of Deissé,—not liable to reproach,—

Son of great Cormac, son of Lebriuth,

Son of Ota, son of Orric the good,

Son of Moric, son of Leo, full of prosperity,

Son of Maximus, why not name him?

Son of Encretta, the tall and comely,

Son of Philisti, the best of men,

Son of Fereni, of no mean repute,

<sup>(146)</sup> original:—"naem feneur naem mpe fáil".

Son of Brittan, otter of the sea,
 From whom the passionate Britons descend.
Cochmas was his modest mother,
Nemthor was his native town;
 Of Munster not small his share,
 Which Patrick freed from all sorrow".<sup>(147)</sup>

I must observe here, that in a copy of this poem, in the handwriting of the Rev. Michael O'Clery, the chief of the Four Masters, described by me in a former lecture,<sup>(148)</sup> and now preserved in the Burgundian Library at Brussels, Eochaidh O'Cleircein is set down as the author, and under the peculiar distinction of "Eochaidh of the battle of Craebh Tulcha". The Four Masters record this battle of Craebh Tulcha, (which was, I believe, in the county Antrim), as having been fought between the people of Down and Antrim, in the year 1003; but there is no mention of this Eochaidh in their account of it.

It is probable that the metrical compositions of Flann were much more numerous than we know of now. It was the universal practice of the teachers of history, and of the language in the early schools in Erin, to compose their lessons in verse, according to the very artificial system of the Gaedhelic prosody; and in this manner it was that the student learned not only the facts which he was required to know, but also that dexterity in wielding the language which he was obliged to acquire before he could take even the lowest of those professional ranks of privileged men of learning, of whose distinctions an account has been given in former lectures.<sup>(149)</sup> And the poems of Flann, as well as of the other historical writers before referred to, are all of this class.

History
 anciently taught in verse.

In his Synchronisms, of which an account was also given on <sup>(147)</sup> original:—*pacraic, ab eipenn uile, mac calppainn, mic foraire,

 mic deirre, nap doig do liud, mic corraic moir mic leirpiut,
 mic ota, mic oirpuc maic,
 mic moiric, mic léo in lan pairt, mic maximi, maig na ploinn,
 mic enpettea aipo alaino,
 mic pilipitir ferri ar ais cae,
 mic fereni gan anrac,
 mic bputam, do bpa na mapo,
 o tait bpetam bputmapa, Cochmar a matar malla,
 nemthor a baile bago,
 don mumain ni cael a curo,
 po faor ar puor pacraic.*

<sup>(148)</sup> Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 168.

<sup>(149)</sup> Idem. p. p. 2, 204, 219, 220, 229, 241, 243, 255; and ante p. 84

LECT. VIII. a former occasion,<sup>(150)</sup> Flann also followed the system of teaching pursued by his predecessors. He, however, greatly enlarged the scope of their labours, corrected still more their chronology, and compiled at last a body of general comparative history, which was found by scholars five centuries after him not only full of valuable matter, but presenting that matter perfectly arranged and in shape ready to their hands. These Synchronisms consist of parallel lines of the kings and chiefs of all the ancient nations, both of Asia and of Europe, from the very earliest records of the human race, their proper dates being assigned to each, and the parallel line of the monarchs of Erin carried down in regular order, corresponding to their dates, as far as the year 918. For the better understanding of these Synchronisms, or perhaps for their more convenient arrangement in lessons or lectures, these chronological lines are divided into periods of a century each. And in addition to these Synchronisms of general history, the master has also transmitted to us similar parallel lines of the provincial kings of Erin, and of the kings and chiefs of those tribes of the Gaedhils who had migrated into, and settled in Scotland.

Of these important works of Flann I gave some description before; but I could not properly describe here his character as a teacher, nor make clear the nature of the education dispensed through the medium of the Gaedhelic language in our ancient schools, without recalling these labours also of one of the most remarkable men of learning, of his day, in Europe.

Of the life
of Flann
Mainistrech;
and of his sons after him.

So much for what remains to us of all the learning which one of the greatest of our mediæval scholars left behind him; fortunately for his particular reputation, on the one hand, and to serve as a witness of the nature and extent of the learning taught in the secular schools of Erin in his time on the other. Of Flann's private life or history nothing remains to us; of his public life we have on record the fact of his having risen to the highest position in the profession of learning, being a Fer-Leighinn, or head professor or master in the great school of Monasterboice: and we have evidence of his great celebrity in after ages, in the high compliment paid to him by the Four Masters (whose words of praise are always very measured), in the following entry of his death, with the stanza from some cotemporary bard, recorded in the annals at the year 1056:

"A.D. 1056. Flann of the Monastery, chief professor of Saint Buite's Monastery, the wise master of the Gaedhils in literature, history, philosophy, and poetry, died on the fourteenth of the kalends of December; as it is said:

<sup>(150)</sup> Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 53.

“Flann of the chief church of holy Buité,
 Still is the brilliant eye of his noble head:
 An enchanting poet was he whom we deplore,
 The last great professor of Erin, our Flann”.

In a former lecture it was shown that Flann was not an ecclesiastic,<sup>(151)</sup> but only the principal teacher, head master, or rector of a great lay school or college, at Monasterboice. It is interesting to know that learning did not die in his family with Flann himself. He had three sons named Eochaidh Erann, Echtighern, and Feidlimidh. Eochaidh Erann, the eldest, appears to have left no issue, nor does his name occur at all in the Annals of the Four Masters; but the deaths of both the other sons, and of the sons of one of them, are honourably recorded, as follows:

“A.D. 1067. Echtighern, son of Flann of the Monastery, Airchinnech, [or land-steward] of Saint Buité's monastery, died.

“A.D. 1104. Feidlimidh, son of Flann of the Monastery, a faithful soldier of Christ, who was an illustrious senior and an eminent historian, died.

“A.D. 1117. Eoghan, son of Echtighern, lay successor or representative of Saint Buité, died.

“A.D. 1122. Feargna, son of Echtighern, successor of Saint Buité, a wise priest, died”.

The list of teachers and learned men could, of course, be very much extended, after Flann, and down to the time of the Four Masters and Duald Mac Firis. The names of the principal of these are to be found in O'Reilly. I have, however, I think, abundantly proved not only the existence of an early and general education in Erin, but the continued exercise also of the practice of it in the Gaelic tongue, without interruption, to a comparatively recent period,—which was all I proposed to do at present.

The existence of a line of learned men in Erin, through successive generations, beginning from the early colonization of the country by the Milesians, is evidence of the existence of means and opportunity for education, and of its encouragement at a very remote period. The constant succession, down to quite modern times, of men of learning formally honoured as well as protected by the laws, and equally so by the usages of society, no matter what the wars, invasions, or other troubles by which, on so many occasions, the country was torn during the lapse of centuries, proves how constant and how general was the respect for education among the whole people. I have, however, not rested solely upon this fact alone, in endeavouring to con-

General education in Erin in the early ages.

(151) Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 56.

LECT. VIII.

Continued
cultivation of the Gaedhelic language after the introduction of Christianity.

vey something like a sketch of what social life must have been of old among our Milesian ancestors. I have shown from the ancient laws, as well as by examples of their operation, the nature of the Profession of Learning in Erin before the Christian era; and I have shown that on the arrival of Saint Patrick, he found in the country many learned men, and a system of education flourishing on such a scale as to prove how well the wise encouragement of learning, instituted by our earliest lawgivers, had been carried out in practice for ages previous to his arrival. In those ages it will not fail to be observed, the knowledge of the Latin tongue not having penetrated so far west, the learning and literature of the Gaedhils was naturally preserved in their own rich and beautiful language alone. And I have shown that subsequently, when Saint Patrick and his clerical followers and successors introduced Latin with Christianity, it never superseded our native language in the works even of ecclesiastical writers, much less in the schools. All the early Gaedhelic saints and ecclesiastics had been, in their boyhood, educated in the Gaedhelic tongue; and all the more distinguished of them were poets and historians, who wrote ever in their own idiom in preference to that which the rest of Europe already appropriated to learning. And this general use of our native language by men of cultivation continued, it is to be observed, even down to the seventeenth century; so lasting was the influence of those early institutions which I have endeavoured to describe.

In the course of the chronological account I have shortly given of the more remarkable of the learned men among the Gaedhils, I mentioned that each of them (with few exceptions) was a teacher, or lecturer, as well as a poet and historian. And in fact most of the metrical compositions which I have mentioned as the existing literary remains of so many of these professors, were nothing more than lessons of historical knowledge, composed in Gaedhelic verse for the use of the students over whose education they presided.

I have also called attention particularly to the fact that in Christian times the seminaries of education ever since so celebrated, in connection with the great ecclesiastics under whose fame they successively grew up, were by no means merely ecclesiastical colleges, but general schools for the laity at large. And it is this fact that explains the recorded accounts of the vast numbers of students who attended certain of these colleges at the same time, numbers only surpassed by the still more extensive establishments of Paris, and one or two other great seats of mediæval learning, some centuries afterwards.

Lastly, in describing the nature of the profession of teacher as such, and as distinguished from the Filé, Ollamh, or Philosopher, I have explained, from the ancient laws themselves, the nature of the rank and duties of the different professors and masters of a college, as established under the regulations prescribed by the national legislature of the period.

So far, the records of our ancient legislation which have escaped from the wreck of so many ages, supply us with sure and minute accounts. And it so happens, that upon the labours of the student, and even upon the course of his studies, the academic curriculum of the time, we are fortunate enough to possess equally clear and precise contemporary information. For, in the Book of Ballymote there is preserved a long and important tract upon this subject, under the name of the Leabhar Ollamhan, or Book of the Ollamhs, a tract which, singularly enough, appears to have escaped the notice of modern Gaedhelic scholars, so many of whom are, I regret to say, more inclined to invent general theories of our ancient modes of life, to the taste of the modern public, than to seek the real truth by examining the ancient books themselves, in which it is abundantly recorded. This curious record of the system of instruction of the schools, will best speak for itself. It begins as follows:

LECT. VIII.

System of Academic Education in early times.

"The authority and order of the learning of the Gaedhil are, the twelve divisions (or books) of Fíledecht", [that is, properly, as I have before explained, Philosophy, though ordinarily translated Poetry]; "and each book contains a year's learning (or lessons), as the ancient poet Dithirné says to his pupil Amergin: O praiseworthy Amergin! dost thou know the different divisions of poetry, the true knowledge of the Dian of the Fochlachan, the Mac Mecnachan of the Fuirmid, the Dronchard of the Dos, the Ardreth of the Caná, the Cinntech of the Cli, the Adbreth of the Anradh, the Brosnacha of the Sai, the Feis Comarca of the Fílidh, the Fochairech of the Eiges, the Sendata of the Seaghdair, and the Anamain of the Ollamh? Name for me each of the different degrees of these twelve kinds of exercise up to the Ollamh".—And so on.

The twelve divisions, books, or stages, of the native ancient collegiate study extended over twelve years; but as a full explanation of the nature of the study of each year would necessarily occupy the space of nearly a whole lecture, we must, for the present, pass them over lightly, and I can do little more than give here the original names of the different kinds of compositions which the student read, and by the gradual acquirement of which he ascended the ladder of intellectual cultivation,

The ancient Academic, or University, course.

LECT. VIII.
The ancient Academic, or University,
course.

from the degree of Fochlachan, or mere learner of words, to that of the Ollamh, who was master of the entire course.

The first year's study, then, is stated to have embraced fifty "Oghams", or alphabets, and the Araicecht, or Grammar of the pupils; together with the learning of twenty Tales, and some Poems.

The second year's study consisted of fifty Oghams more; six minor lessons of Philosophy; thirty Tales; and some Poems.

The third year's study embraced Fifty more Oghams or alphabets; the learning of the correct diphthongal combinations; the six minor lessons of Philosophy; Forty Tales; and various Poems.

The study of the fourth year was Fifty Tales; then the Bretha Nemidh, or Laws of Privileges; and twenty poems of the species called Enan.

The study of the fifth year was Sixty Tales; and the critical learning of the adverbs, articles, and other niceties of grammar.

The study of the sixth year consisted of Twenty-four great Naths, and Twenty-four small Naths (certain kinds of poems); the style of composition called the Secret Language of the Poets; and Seventy Tales.

The study of the seventh year was the Brosnacha of the Sai (or professor); and the Bardesy of the Bards; "for these" (says the writer of the tract from which I am abstracting) "the poet is obliged to know; and so they are the study of the seventh year".

The study of the eighth year was the knowledge of Prosody, or the Versification of the Poets; of Glosses, or the meaning of obsolete or obscure words; of the various kinds of Poetry; of the Druidical or Incantatory compositions, called Teinm Laeghdha, Imbas Forosnai, and Dichetal-di-Chennaibh (which I explained on a former occasion); also the knowledge of Dinnseanchus or Topography; and finally, of all the chief Historical Tales of Erin, such as were to be recited in the presence of kings, chiefs, and good men; "for without this" (continues the tract) "the poet is not perfect, as the poetical proverb says:

"It is no palace without kings;

He is no poet without stories;

She is no virgin if not modest;

He has no good sense who does not read".<sup>(152)</sup>

The studies of the ninth and tenth years consisted of Forty

(152) original:—ní ba óúnao gan nígu, ní ba píli cen récla,
ní ba hingen minap rial,
ní maich ciall neich nao léga.

Sennats; Fifteen Luascas; Seven Nenas; and an Eochraid of sixty words, with their appropriate verses; Seven Sruths; and six Duili Fedha.

LECT. VIII.

The ancient Academic, or University, course.

The study of the eleventh year was Fifty great Anamains, and Fifty minor Anamains. The great Anamain was a species of poem which contained four different measures of composition; namely, the Nath, the Anair, the Laidh, and the Eman; and it was composed by an Ollamh only.

The study of the twelfth year was six score great Ceatals (measured addresses or orations); and the four arts of Poetry; namely, Laidcenn Mac Barceda's art; Ua Crotta's art; O'Bricne's art; and Beg's art.

The author of the tract does not favour us with any specimens of these "arts" of poetry, nor any further clue to their authorship than the mere names just quoted.

Of the first of them, Laidcenn, son of Bairced, some account was given in a former lecture,<sup>(153)</sup> when speaking of the monarch Niall of the Nine Hostages, to whom he was court poet about the year 400. Ua Crotta, and Ua Bricne I never heard of before; nor of the fourth, who is called Beg, unless he was Beg Mac De, a famous poet and "prophet" of Munster, who was attached to the court of the monarch Diarmait, at Tara, about the year 550. And I may observe here that the names given to all these different kinds of compositions are merely arbitrary, and quite incapable of any appreciable analysis; and this, even the great etymological glossarist, Cormac Mac Cullinan, acknowledges in his glossary, written about a thousand years ago, in which at the word Anair, a species of negative laudatory poem, he says: "It was the ingenuity of the poets that invented these names for their compositions, to distinguish their various species, and it was not their nature or character they took into account".

The curious tract, of the contents of which I have here only given a very meagre abstract, is of considerable extent, and is copiously illustrated with examples of all the different kinds of compositions known to, and taught by, the ancient Gaedhelic masters before the introduction of Christianity. The length of the academic course will, perhaps, be deemed subject of surprise, in comparison with those of modern colleges. But it is to be observed that it begins at the very beginning of literary education, and concludes only with an amount of critical education carried far beyond the wants of any students but those who aspired to becoming themselves, in their turn, Teachers or Ollamhs in learning.

<sup>(153)</sup> ante; p. 69.

LECT. VIII.

Of the legal relations between Teacher and Pupil.

One thing only remains for observation, before I pass from the subject of education, to pursue the remainder of the present course of lectures on the civilization and manners of life in ancient Erinn: I mean the social relation between master and pupil, as established by the law. That relation was a very close one, and was the subject of enactments of a very stringent kind. The whole subject cannot be properly treated until the publication of the general code of Laws enables the student of Irish history to take a general view of all the various relations of society for which that code was formed. But I cannot properly omit it altogether, though I shall for the present content myself with quoting but a short extract from one of the Law MSS., (H. 2. 15. in the Library of Trinity College). The passage literally translated is as follows:

"The union (says the legal writer) which is recognized between the pupil and the tutor, or instructing father, as he was called, was this: the tutor bestowed instruction without reservation, and correction without violence, upon the pupil; and he supplied him with food and clothing as long as he continued to pursue his legitimate studies, if he did not receive them for anybody else".

This rule, it is stated, was derived from the great school of Fenius Farsaidh, the remote ancestor of the Milesians, who was, according to the ancient traditions, the first to collect and teach the various languages after the confusion at Babel.

The pupil so supported during his pupilage by the tutor, was, on his side, legally bound to assist or relieve the tutor in case of his being reduced in circumstances, and to take care of him in his old age; and whatever profession the pupil might adopt, the tutor was entitled, at the hands of strangers, to a certain fine, or "logh enech", appointed to him by law, for any insult or bodily injury which should happen to be offered to the pupil in that profession. The tutor was also entitled to all the profits arising from any literary or other work of the pupil so long as he continued under his instructions, and also to the first fees or fruits of his profession after quitting his school.

Such relations as these between tutor and pupil, as laid down strictly in our ancient laws, surely bespeak, like many others of our social institutions, a people deeply impressed with the value of education; and such laws afford curious proof of the equitable, if not grateful, remembrance in which the pupil was bound to hold the important care, solicitude, and benefits which the master had bestowed upon him in his youth. And it is well to remember that such was the ancient Irish law, as well as practical custom, upon the important subject of Education, when we find our ancient laws so often ridiculed as "barbarous", LECT. VIII.

by those whose ancestors took such pains to suppress every vestige of education among us, and who so lamentably succeeded in bringing down the civilization of the Gaedhil.

Of the kindly obedience of some of our greatest scholars to the law by which they were bound to cherish the old age of their teachers, an interesting instance may be pointed out in an allusion contained in one of the oldest of the existing Gaedhelic writings, an allusion explained distinctly by a very ancient scholiast. Every Irish student is familiar with the name Aengus Ceilé Dé, or the "Culdee", so often spoken of in the course of my former lectures. He was the pupil for a time of Saint Maelruan of Tallaght, near Dublin; and the following stanza (which is the fifty-seventh of the metrical preface to his Festology, where he gives a list of illustrious Irishmen who had then recently died,) alludes to his performance of the duties just mentioned, during the last years of the aged teacher's life:

"Maelruan, after our nursing of him,—

The shining sun of Meath's southern border,—

At his undefiled sepulchre

The wounds of all hearts are healed".<sup>(154)</sup>

And beside the direct assertion of Aengus in the text, the scholiast explains that it was Aengus's part, in particular, among all his pupils to take care of the beloved tutor in his old age.

In the case of kings and great chiefs, the pupil was not of course supported by the master. On the contrary, the master was supported at the court of the prince, where he generally occupied the highest rank. And on the termination of the education of a king, and his succession to power, it often happened, very naturally, that he availed himself directly of his former master's wisdom by making him at once his chief counsellor, or, as we should call it, his prime minister; and this he did entirely without regard to the family or original rank of the man of learning, or even his connection with the king's own name or clann. Instances of this kind occurred, for example, in the case of Fothadh na Canóiné, and king Aedh Oirnidhé, and in that of Maelsuthain O'Carroll, and king Brian Boromha, of both of whom I gave some account on a former occasion.<sup>(155)</sup>

Teachers employed as Ministers of State by their former Pupils.

<sup>(154)</sup> original:—mælrúan ias na gairne,
grían mar veir muige mroie,
oca leacht co n-glaine,
icthar cneat cech crioie.

<sup>(155)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 76; and App. p. 529.

LECT. VIII.

Fothadh "na Canoiné," the chief counsellor of the Monarch Aedh Oirðnidhe (circa A.D. 800).

Fothadh na Canoiné was abbot of Fathan Mura (now Fahan, in the county of Donegal), and he had been the tutor of Aedh (or Hugh) Oirðnidhé, who was monarch of Erin from the year 793 to the year 817. On the elevation of his pupil to the monarchy, the learned tutor, as was customary, wrote a Royal Precept, or Rule of Government for him, in a vigorous poem of seventy-two stanzas, a fine copy of which is preserved in the Book of Leinster. And it appears that after this the king took him altogether to himself, and introduced him into his council as his chief adviser. Accordingly, we find the monarch, in the year 799, submitting to him for decision, the controversy respecting the compulsory presence of the clergy in battle, as part of the army of the king, a controversy which arose between Aedh and the body of the clergy of the north, whom he had compelled to accompany him upon an hostile expedition into Leinster. On this occasion, it will be remembered that Fothadh decided in the metrical sentence, or "Canon", from which he has since been called by the name just referred to, in favour of the exemption of the clergy from such attendance; and the monarch having acquiesced, this decision continued ever after to be the legal rule upon the subject throughout the island.

In the metrical precept, or poem on the duties of a king, composed by Fothadh for King Aedh, occurs a very interesting allusion to what has been mentioned as to the office of teacher continuing to be a layman's function, even after the introduction of Christianity; and as this fact seems to be little regarded, I may quote here the explicit testimony of this very early authority. The passage occurs in the nineteenth stanza of this curious poem addressed to the king, which runs as follows:

"Your own tutor, [or adviser],
Let your alms be in his hand,
Whether he be a pure wise priest,
Or a layman, or a poet".<sup>(156)</sup>

In this stanza the writer, though himself a priest, lays down the rule as he thought it ought to be, in accordance with the ancient practice. The object of the sentence is to recommend the king (and in these precepts addressed to young kings, the poet always spoke generally, and traced as it were a general system of conduct for all kings to come), always to entrust to the wisdom of the learned man to whom he had looked up as his literary and philosophical instructor, the task of acting as his

<sup>(156)</sup> original:—*Ṭ-anmcara fadéin,
Ṭ-almra 'na láith,
Sió cleineach glan gaeth,
Sió laech, sió fear spaird.*

The Profession of Teaching not confined to the clergy in early Christian times.

almoner: an office implying in those days far more than the dispensation of charities, for it included also the distribution of rewards, the payment and entertainment of vassals and followers, and perhaps most of the duties of a royal Treasurer and Minister of Finance of the present time. And this office the teacher advises should be conferred on the king's tutor, whether priest or layman; for the office was a secular political office, in effect; and on the other hand, the Profession of Teaching, the practice of Philosophy, and the acquirement of Literature and Learning, were by no means confined to the priesthood. In the time of Pothadh and king Aedh it continued to be what it was long before the introduction of Christianity, the crowning prize of schools which were open to all alike, and in which all the knowledge of the age was publicly taught to the laity at large, whether intended or not for the sacred mission; and taught, not through the medium of the Latin tongue, as in many other countries, but through that of the ancient language of the Gaedhelic race itself.

The other example to which I have referred of the teacher of a king being honoured as his minister, happens also to be an instance of a lay teacher, though one possessed of ecclesiastical property. Brian Boromha, who was monarch of Erin from the year 1002 to the year 1014, was educated at the ancient monastery of Inis Faithlenn, [Inisfallen] in the Lakes of Killarney, by the learned Maelsuthain O'Carroll, who was chief of the Eoganacht of Loch Lein, and hereditary lay abbot for the time (for he was not a priest) of that monastery.<sup>(157)</sup> Brian's education must, it is true, have been imperfect, as the constant disturbances arising from his wars with the Danes called him away from his studies to active life at the too early age of sixteen years, and from that moment to the end of his long life it is little likely that he could have ever found leisure to resume them. For the Dalcassian clans, over whom his brother Mahon presided as king of Munster, were, during the whole of the next half century, engaged in almost incessant war, and Brian early became one of the most distinguished and indefatigable of their warriors. Mahon's career was closed by captivity and death about the year 974, upon which Brian succeeded to the government of Munster; and it was not without still more constant toil that he maintained that rule, as he did with skill and bravery, from that period down to the year 1002, when he assumed the government of the whole kingdom.

At what time Brian called to his councils his old tutor, the sage O'Carroll, I cannot say; but in or about the year 1002

<sup>(157)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History; p. 76; and App. 529 et seq. and 653.

Maelsuthain O'Carroll, the chief counsellor of Brian Boromha.

LECT. VIII. we find him in the position of secretary to the king, in which capacity he accompanied Brian to Armagh, when Maelsuthain made that memorable record in the ancient Book of the Canons of St. Patrick, of which I gave some account in a former lecture,—in the presence, as he states, of Brian, “the Emperor of the Gaedhils”, [“Imperator Scotorum”].<sup>(158)</sup>

I have referred to these familiar instances in our history, of the practical respect in which the profession of teacher was held of old, merely as instances. I need hardly repeat that the high social position of the teacher was the rule, not the exception; and such instances serve to show how those relations, which were determined by an enlightened system of law in the earliest ages, still continued to be cherished down to a comparatively modern period. In fact they flowed from the law and system of Gaedhelic society itself. And it is in this that we find so strong a proof of the real love of learning, the true civilization of our remote ancestors.

I have now concluded what I had to say upon this branch of our general subject. When I stated, at the commencement of the present series of lectures, that I proposed to deal with the interesting theme of the social customs and manner of life in ancient Erin, it was probably expected that I should at once take up those branches of it which relate to the internal family life of the people; their habitations and furniture; their dress and ornaments; their arms and mode of warfare; their music and musical instruments; and other similar matters. And these subjects will necessarily occupy an important portion of the present course. But to give anything like an adequate idea, however roughly sketched, of the nature and value of the kind of civilization enjoyed by our forefathers, it was indispensable to begin with the graver parts of their social system, upon which all else was founded. And therefore it was that I had first to deal with their system of Legislation and their Code of Laws; and, after this, with their system of Education, and the fruits it bore. This portion of my subject has, of necessity, occupied a somewhat longer space than I had originally expected; but is now at last concluded, and we approach the consideration of topics of, perhaps, more general interest.

(158) See Lectures, etc., ubi supra.

LECTURE IX.

[Delivered 25th June, 1857.]

(IV.) OF DRUIDS AND DRUIDISM in ancient Erinn. Vague statements as to Druids and Druidism in the Encyclopaedias. Account of the British Druids in Rees's Cyclopaedia. Rowland's account of the Druids of Anglesey. Nothing precise known of the Druids in Britain. Druidism originated in the East. Of the origin of Druids in Erinn, according to our ancient writings. Of the Druids of Partholon; of the Nemidians, and the Fomorians; etc. Explanation of the name of Mona; (the Isle of Anglesey). Of Druidism among the Tuatha Dé Danann;—among the Fírbolgs;—among the Milesians. Instance of Druidism on the occasion of the landing of the Milesians. The Incantation of Emergin. References to Druidism in ancient Irish writings;—the Dinnseanchas (on the names of Midhe and Uisnech). Druidical fire. Of the story of King Eochaidh Airemh, and Queen Edain (circa B. C. 100). The Irish Druid's wand of Divination made of the Yew, not Oak. Use of Ogam writing by the Druids. Of the story of Cuchulainn and the lady Eithne (circa A. D. 1). Of the Sidhe or Aes Sidhe,—now called "Fairies". Of the story of Lughaidh Reo-derg. Of the school of Cathbadh, the celebrated Druid of king Conchobar Mac Nessa. The Druids Teachers in ancient Erinn.

Of all the systems of Religion or Worship, mixed with Philosophy and Science, of which the fertile mind of man was the parent, from the earliest period to the present day, there is not one perhaps which has obtained more early and lasting celebrity than that which has passed under the somewhat indefinite name of "Magic", as the description of the very imperfectly investigated Religion or Philosophy of the more ancient nations of the East. And there is, unfortunately, no system of which fewer satisfactory vestiges, or authentic historical details, have come down to our times.

The compilers of modern Encyclopaedias have, I suppose, exhausted all the ancient classical writers in an effort to present to the world some intelligible view of the Religion or Philosophy of "Magic" under one of its most interesting forms, and one that seemed the least unfavourable for historical investigation, that, namely, of Druidism; to which, as that form of the Eastern Philosophy or Religion which prevailed in early ages in our own as well as other western nations, I have now to direct attention. The best English article I have found on the subject, because free from the gross fabrications of Vallancey and Toland, touching Irish Druids, is to be found in Rees's Encyclopaedia. Yet, after all the labour of the learned writer, and although he has devoted many closely printed pages to the Vague statements as to Druids and Druidism in the Encyclopaedias.

LECT. IX.

Vague statements as to Druids and Druidism in the Encyclopædia.

subject, liberally quoting his authorities, still when we come to look for some specific description of Druids and Druidic Rites, we find nothing but the most vague and general assertions: that the Druids were Priests who sacrificed human and other victims; but how, or to whom, we are not satisfactorily told;—that they were Teachers of occult Sciences, and the favourite tutors of the children of the higher classes; but no instances are given;—that they were absolute Judges in cases of life and property; but by whom constituted, or under what laws, we are not told;—that they practised Magic and Augury; but we are not given any particulars;—not even furnished with so much as the name of any one great master of those arts among them, nor with any remarkable instance of their application.

As to the origin and history of Druidism, where and how it originally sprang, such books of reference as those I have alluded to, are equally unsatisfactory. Yet, perhaps the best general introduction by which I can preface what I have to say on the subject of Druidism in Erin would be to quote the substance of the account given by the essayist in Rees's Cyclopædia; for we shall then see to what extent our Gaedhelic authorities will enable us to define what this learned writer has been unable to make clear, and to supply what he has failed to discover from classical authorities.

"The Druids" (says this writer), "are said by some to have been a tribe of the ancient Celts or Celtæ, who emigrated, as Herodotus assures us, from the Danube towards the more westerly parts of Europe, and to have settled in Gaul and in Britain at a very early period. Accordingly, they have traced their origin, as well as that of the Celts, to the Gomerians or the descendants of Gomer, the eldest son of Japhet. But little certain is known concerning them before the time of Caesar, who says that they were one of the two orders of persons that subsisted in Gaul, the other being the Nobles. The case was the same in Britain, where it is supposed the principles and rites of Druidism originated, and from which they were transferred to Gaul. This seems to have been the custom according to the account of the historian: Such of the Gauls as were desirous of being thoroughly instructed in the principles of their religion, which was the same with that of the Britons, usually took a journey into Britain for that purpose. It is universally acknowledged that the British Druids were at this time very famous, both at home and abroad, for their wisdom and learning as well as for their probity, and that they were held in high estimation as the teachers both of religion and philosophy. But it has been disputed whether they were the original inventors of the opinions and system which they taught, or received them from others.

"Some have imagined that the Gauls and other nations in the west of Europe derived the first principles of learning and philosophy from a Phœnician colony which left Greece and built Marseilles in Gaul, about B.C. 540. Others have suggested that the Druids derived their philosophy from Pythagoras, who flourished about five hundred years before Christ, and taught his doctrines at Crotona in Italy.

"It does not appear how widely the Druids were dispersed through Britain and the adjacent isles; but it is well known that their chief settlement was in the isle of Anglesey, the ancient Mona, which they probably selected for this purpose, as it was well stored with spacious groves of their favourite oak.

"As one principal part of their office was to direct the worship and religious rites of the people, the service of each temple required a considerable number of them, and all these lived together near the temple where they served. The Arch-Druid of Britain is thought to have his stated residence in the island of Anglesey above mentioned, where he lived in great splendour and magnificence, according to the custom of the times, surrounded by a great number of the most eminent persons of his order.

"The Druids were also divided into several classes or branches, viz., the Vacerri, Bardi, Eubages, Semnothii or Semnothei, and Saronidae. The Vacerri are held to have been the priests; the Bardi, the poets; the Eubages, the augurs; and the Saronidae, the civil judges and instructors of youth.

"Strabo only distinguishes three kinds: bardi; eubages, or vates, and Druids; though the last name was frequently given to the whole order.

"As several monuments were erected by the Druids for religious and other purposes, to say nothing of Stonehenge, we cannot question their having made great progress in the science of mechanics, and in the mode of applying mechanical power, so as to produce very astonishing effects.

"Medicine, or the art of healing, must also have been the object of attention and study among the Druids, for they were the physicians as well as the priests both of Gaul and Britain. To this purpose, being much addicted to superstition, those who were afflicted with a dangerous disease sacrificed a man, or promised that they would sacrifice one, for their recovery.

"The British Druids were great magicians, and much addicted to divination, by which they pretended to work a kind of miracle, and exhibited astonishing appearances in nature, to

LECT. IX.

Vague statements as to Druids and Druidism in the Encyclopædia.

LECT. IX. penetrate into the counsels of Heaven, to foretell future events, and to discover the success or miscarriage of public or private undertakings.

“‘In Britain’, says Pliny (N. H. l. 30, c. 1.) ‘the magic arts are cultivated with such astonishing success and so many ceremonies at this day (A. D. 60), that the Britons seem to be capable of instructing even the Persians themselves in these arts’.

“Of the British Academies the most considerable were situated in the isle of Anglesey, near the mansion of the Arch-Druid. Here is a place that is called Myfyrion, that is, the place of meditation or study; another called Caer-Edris, that is, the city of astronomers; and another Cerrig-Brudyn, or the astronomer’s circle.

“Their great solemnity and festival was that of the cutting the mistletoe from the oak. This festival is said to have been kept as near as the age of the moon would permit to the 10th of March, which was their New Year’s Day. The first of May was also a great festival, in honour of Bellinus or the Sun.

“Of the Druidical creed it was an article that it was unlawful to build temples to the gods, or to worship them within walls, or under roofs. (Tacit. de Mor. Germ., c. 9.)

“The Druids, says Pliny, have so high an esteem for the oak, that they do not perform the least religious ceremonies without being adorned with a garland of its leaves.

“The Druids had no image, but they worshipped a great oak tree as a symbol of Jupiter.

“They were selected from the best families. They were chief judges, and held their high court in Anglesey, in a cirque. One of these is called Brein Gwyn, that is, the supreme tribunal, in the townland of Fér Dryd.”

Rowland’s
account of the Druids of Anglesey.

So far the article in Rees’s Encyclopaedia on the Druids; but let us see what Rowland, another and older Welshman, a native, too, of Mona itself, or Anglesey, says of the sort of authority which existed for these glowing accounts of the Druids of that island.

“I think I may take it for granted”, says this very candid writer, “that it is the generally received account, among all sorts of people in Wales who pretend to anything of antiquity, that the Isle of Mona or Anglesey was anciently the seat of the British Druids: nay, there is not a book of late written of history or geography, which touches the isle of Anglesey, but gives the same account; though the opinion, for all I could yet see, rather seems to have been taken upon trust, passing from hand to hand, among the authors who had lately mentioned it, than well settled upon its due foundation and evidence. ’T is to no purpose to recite instances which are too many, and which only serve to prove a consent, and that it has not been till of late years contradicted, which is all I propose in this part of the proof".<sup>(159)</sup>

LECT. IX.

So far, then, Rees and Rowland upon the general character of the British Druids, their reputed learning and religion, and their establishment in the island of Anglesey; and I have here introduced so much on the subject, in order that we may be able to judge by comparison how far, and where the few notices of our Irish Druids which I have been able to collect, will agree with them.

We see from these English articles that nothing precise is known in England of the origin of Druids and Druidism in Britain; no native authorities of any kind quoted; in fact, nothing but a few opinions derived from foreign writers, and elaborately stated on trust by modern English authors, as Rowland so honestly admits.

Nothing precise known of the Druids in Britain.

It must occur to every one who has read of Zoroaster, of the Magi of Persia, and of the sorceries of Egypt mentioned in the seventh chapter of Exodus, that Druids and Druidism did not originate in Britain any more than in Gaul or Erinn. It is indeed probable that, notwithstanding Pliny's high opinion of the powers of the British Druids, the European Druidical system was but the offspring of the Eastern augury, somewhat less complete, perhaps, when transplanted to a new soil than in its ancient home.

Druidism originated in the East.

I shall not, however, here attempt to trace the first origin of Druidism in Europe; nor shall I even endeavour, at present, to suggest any theory of what exactly constituted our own Druidism in ancient Erinn. Perhaps the time is not come for satisfactory inquiry, either into the nature of the Druidical Philosophy, (or "Religion", if it be proper so to call it), or into the details of the rites and ceremonies used by the Druids. For my own part I feel that I have at present more to do with the materials upon which hereafter to found a theory concerning this difficult subject of history, than with the imagination of one for myself. And so, merely calling attention to the rashness of such speculators upon Druidism as the writers I have just referred to, I shall confine myself here to a simple narration of what is to be found, upon Druids and Druidism, scattered over our own annals and earlier historic pieces; and that entirely apart from any comparison of the results of such an inquiry with what is to be found in the classic or other foreign authorities. Be it

<sup>(159)</sup> Rowland's Mona Antiqua, p. 89 (Dublin: 1783).

LECT. IX. for others to undertake the task of a final and exhaustive examination of the subject of Druidism in Europe generally.

Let us begin with the earliest mention of Druids as preserved in our annals and historical traditions.

Origin of Druids in Erinn, according to our ancient writings.

The origin of Druids in Erinn is carried back by our ancient writings, (and I am convinced with great probability), to the earliest colonizers of the country, who were all, it is to be remembered, referred to the race of Japhet; and whether there was or was not in the more ancient times anything more than traditional authority for this belief, it is, I think, sufficient to show that the ancient Gaedhils never assumed the origin of the Druidic system themselves, nor acknowledged to have received it, any more than any other part of their social system, from any neighbouring country.

Druids of Parthalon.

Parthalon is by our most ancient authorities recorded to have come into Erinn about three hundred years after the deluge. He is said to have come from "Migdonia", or Middle Greece, with a small company; but among these we are told that there were three Druids,—whose names are given: Fios, Eolus, and Fochmare; that is, if we seek the etymological meaning of the words, Intelligence, Knowledge, and Inquiry. We have no record of any performance of these Druids of Parthalon.

Druids of the Nemidians and Fomorians.

The next colony, led by Nemid and his sons, is said to have come from "Scythia", about three hundred and thirty years after the coming of Parthalon. Nemid's sons were: Starn, Iarbonel "the Prophet", Fergus "the Half-Red", and Aininn. And this colony soon, according to our oldest records, came in contact with the power of hostile Druidism, to which they opposed their own. Nemid, it appears, had not remained long in peace in the country, before he was disturbed by the incursions of the sea rovers, who are known in our old writings under the name of the Fomorians. These adventurers, under a valiant leader named Conaing, son of Faebhar, took possession of Tory Island (on the north-west of the coast of Donegal), which they fortified, and converted into a sort of citadel or depot, and by this means made themselves most formidable and oppressive to the Nemidians on the main land. The Nemidians, driven to despair at last, assembled all their forces, men and women, from all parts of the country, on the shore opposite Tory Island; which the Fomorians perceiving, sent their Druids and Druidesses, we are told, to confound them by their Druidic spells; but these were met by the Nemidian Druids and Druidesses, under the leadership of Reilbeó, "daughter of the king of Greece", Nemid's wife, and chief of the Druidesses. A fierce contest of spells as well as of blows LECT. IX. ensued between them, in which the Fomorian party were defeated. A general battle ensued then, which resulted in the utter rout of the Fomorians, whose tower or fortress on Tory Island was demolished, and their chief leader, Conaing, and his sons, were killed.

The Nemidians did not long enjoy the peace and freedom which this victory brought them; for More the son of Dela, another famous rover or Fomorian chief, came, with sixty ships, took possession again of Tory Island, and renewed the oppressions practised by his predecessor upon the Nemidians. This led to another great battle, in which the destruction of the parties was mutual; More and a few of his followers, only, escaping to the island, and but one ship of the Nemidians, with only thirty warriors and three leaders on board, escaping to the land. These three leaders were: Beothach, the son of Iarbonel "the Prophet", son of Nemid; Simeon Breac (or "the speckled"), son of Starn, son of Nemid; and Britan Mael (or "the bald"), son of Fergus the Half-Red, son of Nemid. And it is to these three cousins that the races of the Tuatha Dé Danann, the Firbolgs, and the Britons, are traced by our early genealogists, from whom we learn that the three soon afterwards left Erin, and proceeded to seek a better fortune elsewhere. Beothach, we are told, with his clann, went to the northern parts of Europe, where they made themselves perfect in all the arts of Divination, Druidism, and Philosophy, and returned, after some generations, to Erin, under the name of the Tuatha Dé Danann. Simeon Breac with his clann wandered southward into Greece; and in many generations after, returned to Erin under the name of the Firbolgs. And we learn that Britan Mael, with his father Fergus, and his clann, went to Moinn or Mainn Chonaing, the present Island of Mona (or Anglesey); "from which", says the Book of Ballymote (folio 15), "their children filled the great Island of Britain, which they inhabited until the coming in of the Saxons, who drove the descendants of Brutus to the one border of the country, and the descendants of Britan Mael back to Moinn Chonaing [or Anglesey], on the other border".

And here, let me observe that it seems strange that Rowland and the other Welsh writers of modern times have not attempted to make any guess at the etymology of the name of Mona. This name is indifferently written in our ancient Irish manuscripts as Moin, Main, Moein, and Maen, and never but in connection with the name of Conaing, the great Fomorian chief already mentioned, who had occupied and fortified Tory Island on the coast of Donegal, from which he ravaged the

Explanation
of the name
of Mona;
(the island of Anglesey).

LECT. IX.

Of the Name
of Mona;
(Anglesey.)

mainland of Erinn, and perhaps other countries also. And it was from the tower or fortress erected by him there, and which has been always called Tor Chonaing, or Conaing's Tower, that the island received the name of Tor Inis, or Tower Island, a name modified by the Danes, to Tor-eye, (eye being the Danish name for an island), and adopted in sound, and nearly in orthography, by English writers and speakers.

When we remember, then, that Tory was called Tor Inis Chonaing, or Conaing's Tower Island (and also, for brevity, Tor Chonaing or Conaing's Tower); and that in like manner we find the Island of Anglesey invariably written Moin or Moen Chonaing; we have established an analogy between the origins of both names, which to understand fully requires but to explain the word Moin or Moen through the medium of some recognized language. This we can well do; for, in an ancient Gaedhelic glossary (preserved in MS. H. 3. 18, T.C.D.) we find the following words and explanation:

“Moen”: from [the Latin] Moenia, [signifying] a structure of walls [or ramparts]”.<sup>(160)</sup>

Now, if Tor Chonaing meant, as it is well known it did, Conaing's Tower or Fortress, Moen Chonaing, or Conaing's "Moen", must have had simply a corresponding meaning; and that such it had, I have, I trust, sufficiently shown, from an authority that cannot be questioned. Moen Chonaing, then, means simply, Conaing's Fortress, or fortified island; in the same way that Tor Chonaing meant Conaing's Tower, or Tower Island.

It is also but rational to suppose that the strait or channel which divides this Island of Mona from the mainland of Britain, and which is now called the “Menai Strait”, did not derive that name from any independent source, but that it borrowed it from Maen, the name of the island. And in fact it was anciently called Sruth Moena, or Muir Moena; that is, the River or Sea of Moen; the nominative moen taking a final a in the genitive case, and forming Moena or Moenai, the correct form of the present name of Menai. That channels of this sort were named after the islands which they cut off from the main-land, and not from the land itself, could be shown by many examples if it were necessary; but it is too well known a fact to require illustration here.

It appears then that it was from Erinn that the Isle of Mona (or Anglesey) received its earliest colony; and that that colony was of a Druidical people.

Now going back to the ancient legendary history of the Gaedhils, it is to be remembered that on the flight of Nemid's

<sup>(160)</sup> original:—moen .i. a moenia, murorum ætiorificia.

three grandsons from Erinn, one of them, Simeon Breac, the son of Starn, is said to have gone with his clann into Thrace, that is into Greece. There, we are told, they remained and multiplied during more than two hundred years; when at last they fled from the oppression which, it seems, held them there in a state of slavery, and after many wanderings returned to Erinn again, and with little trouble made themselves masters of the country. These were the Firbolgs. These again, in their turn, were soon after invaded by the Tuatha Dé Danann, the descendants of Iobath, the third grandson or great-grandson of Nemid; and their power and rule were overthrown in the great battle of Magh Tuireadh, of which some account has been given in a former lecture.<sup>(161)</sup>

The Tuatha Dé Danann, or Dadanann tribes, as we have already seen, during the long period of their exile from Erinn, devoted themselves much to the cultivation of Divination, Druidism, and the Philosophy of the northern and eastern parts of Europe; so that they appear to have returned perfectly accomplished in all the secrets and mysteries of the occult sciences of those times. They had a druidical chief or demigod, the great Daghda, as he was called, who was also their military leader. They had, besides him, three chief Druids: Brian, Iuchar, and Iucharba; and two chief professional Druidesses: Becuill and Danann;—besides a great number of private Druids and Druidesses, mentioned by name in the early accounts of the coming of this race.

Druidism
among the
*Tuatha Dé
Danann*.

On the first arrival of the Tuatha Dé Danann, they took up their position in the fastnesses of Middle Connacht, but soon discovered that the country was inhabited by the Firbolgs; they then moved farther south and west, to the plain called Magh Tuireadh, near Cong, in the present county of Galway, as described on a former occasion. The ancient tales record that while they were making this important movement three of their noble non-professional Druidesses, namely, Bodhbh, Macha, and Mór Rígan, went to Tara, where the Firbolg hosts were assembled in a council of war; and that there, by their Druidical arts, they caused clouds of impenetrable darkness and mist to envelope the assembled multitudes, and showers of fire and blood to pour down upon them from the heavens, so that for three days all business was suspended; that at last the spell was broken by the Firbolg Druids, Cesarn, Gnathach, and Ingnathach; but that during this time, the Tuatha Dé Danann had already established themselves without opposition in a new defensive position at a safer distance from their enemies. This

<sup>(161)</sup> Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., p. 243 et seq.

LECT. IX. may serve as one instance of the ancient tradition of the practical use of Druidical magic at a very early period in Erinn.

Druidism
among the Firbolgs.

Again we are told, in the oldest accounts, that previous to the invasion of the Tuatha Dé Danann, the king of the Firbolgs, Eochaidh Mac Erc, had an unusual dream, which he submitted for interpretation to his chief Druid, Cesarn. The Druid is said to have had recourse to the secret agencies of his art, and to have discovered from a vision the approach of a powerful enemy; and this he is said to have communicated to the king in a series of short simple sentences, of which a few are preserved in the account of the great battle of Magh Tuireadh, of which so much was extracted on a former occasion.<sup>(162)</sup> The great battle came at last; and it is stated that the men of science and "knowledge" of both parties took up their positions on rocks and stages on the battle-field, practising their druidic arts in favour of their friends and against their foes respectively; until at last the Tuatha Dé Danann prevailed, and the Firbolgs were defeated.

I need not describe here the curious druidic medical fountain or bath prepared by the Tuatha Dé Danann physicians on this occasion, having gone fully into the whole subject of the battle of Magh Tuireadh in a former lecture.<sup>(163)</sup>

So much for what is found in the few records we possess of our very early colonists.

Ancient traditions of the Milesian Colony.

We now come to the Milesian Colony. According to our ancient traditions, these people, who were also Japhetians, passed in their migrations back from Scythia into Greece, out of which they had previously come; then into Egypt; then into Spain; and so, from Spain into Erinn, which they reached about two hundred years after the conquest of the Tuatha Dé Danann; that is, in the year of the world 3,500, or above 1,530 years before Christ, according to the chronology of the Annals of the Four Masters.

Druidism
among the Milesians.

In the entire course of the migrations of this people, the Druids hold a conspicuous place. Among the most remarkable was Caicher, who is said to have foretold to them, on their way to Spain, that Erinn was their ultimate destination.

The chief Druids of the Milesians, on their arrival in Erinn, were Uar and Eithear (who were both killed in the battle of Sibh Mis, in Kerry), and Amérigin, one of the Milesian brothers, who was the Poet and Judge of the expedition, and a famous Druid, though not by profession.

<sup>(162)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., ubi supra.

<sup>(163)</sup> Ibid.

A remarkable instance of Druidism is stated to have happened even on the very occasion of the landing of the first Milesian colony. Having landed in Kerry, they marched direct to the seat of sovereignty, now called Tara, a place which at the time we are speaking of was called Cathair Crofinn, or Crofinn's Court, from a Tuatha Dé Danann lady of that name, who had previously resided there.<sup>(164)</sup> On arriving at Tara, the Milesians demanded the sovereignty of the country from the three joint kings of the Tuatha Dé Danann, the brothers MacCuill, Mac Cecht, and MacGreiné. These complained of their having been taken by surprise, alleging that if they had had notice of the coming invasion they would have prevented it, and offering to leave it with Amergin to give judgment between them. To this proposition the Milesians are said to have consented; and Amergin is recorded to have made the very singular decision that himself and his friends should reënter their ships, and should move to the distance of "nine waves", (as the authorities agree in stating), out from the land; and then that if they were able to land despite of the Dé Danann, the sovereignty of Erin should be surrendered to them.

LECT. IX.
Instance of Druidism on the occasion of the landing of the Milesians.

This decision, according to this most ancient tradition, was accepted by both parties; and the Milesians reëntered their ships, and went out the prescribed distance upon the sea. No sooner, however, had they done so, than the Dé Danann Druids raised such a tempest as drove the fleet out to sea, and dispersed them. One part of the fleet was driven to the south,—and so round the island, to the north-east again,—under Eremon, son of Milesius. The other part was suffering dreadfully from the tempest, when it occurred to them that the storm was raised by Druidical agency. Donn, the eldest of the Milesian brothers, then sent a man to the topmast of his ship to discover if the power of the wind extended as high as that point. The man ascended, and announced that it was quite calm at that elevation; upon hearing which, Donn cried out: "It is treachery in our men of science not to allay this wind". [By this expression, "men of science", the Druids are referred to here, as well as in many other places]. "It is not treachery", said his brother Amergin; and he arose and pronounced a Druidical oration,—of the ancient gloss on which the following <sup>(164)</sup> The Hill of Tara had five names. The first was Druim Decsain, or the Conspicuous Hill; the second was Liath Druim, or Liath's Hill, from a Fir-bolg chief of that name who was the first to clear it of wood; the third was Druim Cain, or the beautiful Hill; the fourth was Cathair Crofinn, as shown above; and the fifth name was Teamair (now Anglicised Tara, from the genitive case Teamhrach of the word), a name which it got from being the burial place of Téa, the wife of Eremon, the son of Milesius.

LECT. IX. is a literal translation, taken from the Book of Invasions of the O'Clerys, in the Royal Irish Academy:

The Incanta-
tion of Amergin.

"I pray that they reach the land of Erin, those who are riding upon the great, productive, vast sea.

"That they be distributed upon her plains, her mountains, and her valleys; upon her forests that shed showers of nuts and all other fruits; upon her rivers and her cataracts; upon her lakes and her great waters; upon her abounding springs, [or, upon her spring-abounding hills].

"That we may hold our fairs and equestrian sports upon her territories.

"That there may be a king from us in Tara; and that it (Tara) be the territory of our many kings".<sup>(165)</sup>

"That the sons of Milesius be manifestly seen upon her territories.

"That noble Erin be the home of the ships and boats of the sons of Milesius.

"Erin which is now in darkness, it is for her that this oration is pronounced.

"Let the learned wives of Breas and Buaigné pray that we may reach the noble woman, great Erinn.

"Let Eremon pray, and let Ir and Eber implore that we may reach Erin".

At the conclusion of this oration the tempest ceased, according to our authority, and the survivors landed again. And then Amergin, upon putting his foot on dry land, pronounced another propitiatory oration (couched in the same obscure and general language), on the land, and on the waters, to render them more prolific.

In this example we have a curious instance of the very form of words in which it was anciently believed that, in still more remote ages, the Druids framed their incantations. We cannot, however, perceive anything of druidic or magical power, or character, in this oration—nothing, in short, to distinguish it from the prayer of any Christian of the present day, so far as the expression of the speaker's wants and desire. It does not clearly appear to whom the prayer was addressed, or that any ceremony or rite accompanied the delivery of it. I do not, of course, quote it as the certainly genuine prayer of Amergin; but it is, without any doubt, a very ancient piece of composition, and it must, I am persuaded, have been written either by some ancient Druid, or by some person conversant with the style of Druidic practices, and probably at a time long before Druidism became extinct in this country. And as regards the intrinsic innocence of the words used, it is curious enough that the Irish people to this day have an old tradition, that in the most profane and forbidden performances of sorcery and witchcraft, harmless and blessed words have been always used. The common proverb still is: "Blessed words and cursed deeds".<sup>(166)</sup>

<sup>(165)</sup> The Hill had not at this time received the name of Teamair or Tara; but Amergin is made to speak of it by the name by which it was subsequently known.

All that I have set down here is taken directly from our most ancient manuscripts, or those compiled from them; and they show clearly as the historical tradition of the country that each of the older colonies in Ireland was accompanied by its Druids; so that the suggestion of modern British writers that Druidism came first from Britain, or from Anglesey, into Erin, is totally unfounded. I now proceed to select from the long list of Druidic references found in our old books, such as may serve to characterize the profession, so far, at least, as the limits of these lectures will allow. Very many other references there are, no doubt, which ought all to be gathered, all to be arranged and compared, if the subject of Irish Druidism, or indeed of Druidism at all, is to be completely investigated. But in these lectures I can hardly be expected to do more than give the general results, and to show where further information in detail may be obtained.

The allusions and instances to which I shall refer are very much scattered, and I cannot promise much arrangement in my treatment of the subject. I only propose to myself to give a few specimens of what was called Druidism by way of example: and I shall commence by citing from the earliest authority. The ancient tract called Dinnseanchas, (on the Etymology of the names of several remarkable places in Erin), gives the following singular legendary account of the origin of the names of Midhe (now Meath), and of Uisnech, in Meath.

Midhe the son of Brath, son of Detha (says this legend), was the first that lighted a fire for the sons of the Milesians in Erin, on the Hill of Uisnech in Westmeath; and it continued to burn for seven years; and it was from this fire that every chief fire in Erin used to be lighted. And his successor was entitled to a sack of corn and a pig from every house in Erin, every year. The Druids of Erin, however, said that it was an insult to them to have this fire ignited in the country; and all the Druids of Erin came into one house to take council; but Midhe had all their tongues cut out, and he buried the tongues in the earth of Uisnech, and then sat over them; upon which his mother exclaimed: "It is Uaisnech

References to Druidism in ancient Irish writings.—The Dinnseanchas, (on the names of Midhe and Uisnech.)

(166) original:—briathra beannaigte is gníomhacha mallagte.

LECT. IX. [i.e. proudly] you sit up there this night";—and hence the names of Uisnech, and of Midhe (or Meath).

Druidical Fire.

This, I believe, is the first reference to a Druidical fire to be found in our old books.

The story of king Eochaidh Airemh
and queen
Edain, (circa B.C. 100.)

The next remarkable allusion to this subject that is to be found is the account of King Eochaidh Airemh.

It was a century before the Incarnation that Eochaidh Airemh was monarch of Erin; and his queen was the celebrated Edain, a lady remarkable not only for her beauty, but for her learning and accomplishments. One day that Eochaidh was in his palace at Teamair, according to this ancient story, a stranger of remarkable appearance presented himself before him. "Who is this man who is not known to us, and what is his business?" said the king. "He is not a man of any distinction, but he has come to play a game at chess with you", said the stranger. "Are you a good chess player?" said the king. "A trial will tell", said the stranger. "Our chess-board is in the queen's apartment, and we cannot disturb her at present", said the king. "It matters not, for I have a chess-board of no inferior kind here with me", said the stranger. "What do we play for?" said the king. "Whatever the winner demands", said the stranger. [They played then a game which was won by the stranger.] "What is your demand now?" said the king. "Edain, your queen", said the stranger, "but I will not demand her till the end of a year". The king was astonished and confounded; and the stranger, without more words, speedily disappeared.

On that night twelvemonths, the story goes on to tell us, the king held a great feast at Teamair, surrounding himself and his queen with the great nobles and choicest warriors of his realm, and placing around his palace on the outside a line of experienced and vigilant guards, with strict orders to let no stranger pass them in. And thus secured, as he thought, he awaited with anxiety the coming night, while revelry reigned all round. As the middle of the night advanced, however, the king was horrified to see the former stranger standing in the middle of the floor, apparently unperceived by any one else. Soon he advanced to the queen, and addressed her by the name of Bé Finn, (Fair Woman), in a poem of seven stanzas, of which the following is a literal translation:

"O Béfinn! will you come with me
To a wonderful country which is mine,
Where the people's hair is of golden hue,
And their bodies the colour of virgin snow?
"There no grief or care is known;
White are their teeth, black their eyelashes;

LECT. IX.

The Story of
king Eochaidh Átreabh
and queen
Edain, (circa B.C. 100.)

Delight of the eye is the rank of our hosts,
With the hue of the fox-glove on every cheek.

"Crimson are the flowers of every mead,
Gracefully speckled as the blackbird's egg;
Though beautiful to see be the plains of Inisfail,
They are but commons compared to our great plains.

"Though intoxicating to you be the ale-drink of Inisfail,
More intoxicating the ales of the great country;
The only land to praise is the land of which I speak,
Where no one ever dies of decrepit age.

"Soft sweet streams traverse the land;
The choicest of mead and of wine;
Beautiful people without any blemish;
Love without sin, without wickedness.

"We can see the people upon all sides,
But by no one can we be seen;
The cloud of Adam's transgression it is,
That prevents them from seeing us.

"O woman! should you come to my brave land,
It is golden hair that will be on your head;
Fresh pork, beer, new milk, and ale,
You there with me shall have, O Béfinn!"

At the conclusion of this poem, the stranger put his arm around the queen's body, raised her from her royal chair, and walked out with her, unobserved by any one but the king, who felt so overcome by some supernatural influence, that he was unable to offer any opposition, or even to apprise the company of what was going on. When the monarch recovered himself, he knew at once that it was some one of the invisible beings who inhabited the hills and lakes of Erin that played one of their accustomed tricks upon him. When daylight came, accordingly, he ordered his chief Druid, Dallan, to his presence, and he commanded him to go forth immediately, and never to return until he had discovered the fate of the queen.

The Druid set out, and traversed the country for a whole year, without any success, notwithstanding that he had drawn upon all the ordinary resources of his art. Vexed and disappointed at the close of the year he reached the mountain (on the borders of the present counties of Meath and Longford) subsequently named after him Sliabh Dallain. Here he cut four wands of yew, and wrote or cut an Ogam in them; and it was revealed to him, "through his keys of science and his ogam", that the queen Edain was concealed in the palace of the fairy chief, Midir, in the hill of Bri Leith, (a hill lying to the west of Ardagh, in the present county of Longford). The Druid joyfully

LECT. IX. returned to Tara with the intelligence; and the monarch Eochaidh mustered a large force, marched to the fairy mansion of Bri Leith, and had the hill dug up until the diggers approached the sacred precincts of the subterranean dwelling; whereupon, the wily fairy sent out to the hill side fifty beautiful women, all of the same age, same size, same appearance in form, face, and dress, and all of them so closely resembling the abducted lady Edain, that the monarch Eochaidh himself, her husband, failed to identify her among them, until at length she made herself known to him by unmistakable tokens,—upon which he returned with her to Tara.

The Irish
Druid's Wand of Di-vination made of the Yew, not the Oak.

Use of the Ogam writing by the Druids.

This tale exhibits two curious and characteristic features of Irish Druidism; the first, that the Irish Druid's wand of divination was formed from the yew, and not from the oak, as in other countries; the second, that the Irish Druid called in the aid of actual characters, letters, or symbols,—those, namely, the forms of which have come down to our own times cut in the imperishable monuments of stone, so well known as Ogam stones, (many of which may be seen in the National Museum of the Royal Irish Academy.)

The antiquity of this story of Eochaidh Airemh is unquestionable. There is a fragment of it in Leabhar na-h-Uidhré, in the Royal Irish Academy, a manuscript which was actually written before the year 1106; and it is there quoted from the Book of Dromsnechta, which was undoubtedly written before or about the year 430. There is a better copy, but still not perfect nor so old, in the collection formerly in the possession of the late Mr. William Monk Mason, in England.

The Story of
Cuchulainn
and the Lady
Eithné, (circa A.D. 1.)

From the reign of Eochaidh Airemh we now pass down about a century for our next remarkable instance in poetic tradition of these early examples of druidical magic; namely, to the commencement of the Christian era, at which time Cuchulainn the great Ulster champion flourished. This Cuchulainn, [or Cuchulaind] of whom so much has been said in former lectures,<sup>(167)</sup> was as much celebrated for the beauty and symmetry of his person as for his bravery and military accomplishments. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, in the ages of romance, so renowned a warrior should have had many personal admirers among the fair dames of his own and other countries, and that attempts should be made to attract his attention, and to secure his devotion, by those secret arts of sorcery, in the efficacy of which every one believed in those times. I gave, in a former lecture,<sup>(168)</sup> a free analysis of the ancient historic tale of Cuchulainn's successful courtship of the lady Emer, the daughter of Forgall LECT. IX.

<sup>(167)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 87 et seq.

<sup>(168)</sup> Ibid., p. 281 et seq.

Monach of Lusk,—(in the present county of Dublin). The The Story of following occurrence is reported in one of the same series of Cuchulainn historic tales<sup>(169)</sup> to have taken place subsequently to his marriage and the Lady with that lady. Eithné, (circa A.D. 1.)

At one time, says this ancient story, that the men of Ulster were celebrating a fair in the plain of Muirtheimné,—(Cuchulainn's patrimonial territory, which was in the present county of Louth, and comprised the district in which the present town of Drogheda is situated),—a flock of beautiful birds appeared on the loch (or expansion of the Boyne) before them. Cuchulainn gave the birds a peculiar blow with the flat of his sword, called taithbéim, so that their feet and their wings adhered to the water, and they were all caught. Cuchulainn then distributed them among the noble ladies at the fair, two to each, until he came to Eithné, his own lady-love at this time, when he found that he had none left to give her. So Eithné complained bitterly of her lover's neglect, in thus preferring the other ladies to her. "Don't be cast down", said Cuchulainn; "should any more beautiful birds visit the plain of Muirtheimné, or the river Bóind, [or Boinn] you shall have the two most beautiful among them". Shortly after they perceived two beautiful birds upon the lake, linked together by a chain of red gold. They sang low music, which cast all such of the assembly as heard them into a profound sleep. Cuchulainn, however, went towards them, and putting a stone into his crann tabhaill, or sling, cast it at them; but it passed them by. He threw again, and the stone went over and beyond them. "Alas!" said he, "since I first received the arms of a champion, I did not ever make a false throw before this day". He then threw his spear at the birds, and it passed through the wing of one of them; upon which they immediately dived under the water.

Cuchulainn, proceeds this singular tale, went away dispirited at his failure, and after some time, resting his back against a rock, he fell asleep. Immediately afterwards, two fairy women approached him, of whom one wore a green, and the other a crimson cloak, of five folds. The woman with the green cloak came up and smiled at him, and struck him a little blow with a horse-switch; then the other went up to him and smiled at him, and struck him in the same way; and they continued to do this for a long time, each striking him in turn, until he was nearly dead. All the Ultonians saw what happened, and they proposed to awaken him. "Not so", said Fergus, "let him not <sup>(169)</sup> See the Tale of Seirglige Conchulainn, or "The Sick-bed of Cuchulainn and only jealousy of Eimer", in the ATLANTIS, vol. i. p. 362, et seq.; and vol. ii. p. 96.

LECT. IX.

The Story of
Cuchulainn
and the Lady
Eithné, (circa A.D. 1.)

be touched till we see what shall happen". He soon after started up through his sleep. "What has happened you?" inquired the Ultonians. "Take me to the Teti Breac, [i.e. the speckled or painted court,] at Emania", was all that he was able to say to them. He was therefore taken thither; and he remained there a whole year without speaking to any one.

One day, at last, (the tale goes on), before the next November eve, the Ultonians were assembled about him in the house: Fergus between him and the wall; Conall Cearnach between him and the door; Lugaidh Reo-derg (or "the red-striped") at the head of his bed; and Eithné in-gubai (or "the sorrowful"), his mistress, at the foot. While they were thus placed, a strange man came into the chamber, and sat on the side of the bed or couch on which Cuchulainn lay. "What has brought you there?" said Conall Cearnach. "Now", said the stranger, "if this man were in health, he would be a protection to all Ulster, and even in the illness and debility in which he lies, he is still a greater consolation to them. I have come to converse with him", said the stranger. "You are welcome then", said the Ultonians. The stranger then stood up, and addressed Cuchulainn in the following stanzas:

"O Cuchulainn! in thy illness,
Thy stay should not be long;
If they were with thee,—and they would come,—
The daughters of Aedh Abrat.

"Libán, in the plain of Cruaich, has said—
She who sits at the right of Labraid the quick—
That it would give heartfelt joy to Fand,
To be united to Cuchulainn.

"Happy that day, of a truth,
On which Cuchulainn would reach my land;
He should have silver and gold,
He should have abundance of wine to drink.

"If my friend on this day should be Cuchulainn, the son of Soalté,
All that he has seen in his sleep,
Shall he obtain without his army.

"In the plain of Muirtheimné, here in the south,
On the night of Samhuin [November eve], without ill luck,

From me shall be sent Libán,
O Cuchulainn! to cure thy illness".<sup>(170)</sup>

This, it will be perceived, was no other than a poetical invitation to Cuchulainn from Aedh Abrat, a great fairy chief, requesting him to visit his court, at the approaching November eve, and to take his daughter Fand [or Fann] in marriage, promising that he would be then cured of his illness.

<sup>(170)</sup> See original in ATLANTIS, vol. i. p. 378.

"Who are you?" asked the Ultonians. "I am Aengus, the son of Aedh Abrat", said he. The man then left them; and they knew not whence he came nor where he went to, says the tale. Cuchulainn then stood up and spoke. "It is time, indeed", said the Ultonians; "let us know what happened you". "I saw", said he, "a wonderful vision about November eve, last year";—and he then told them all that happened, as related already.

The tale proceeds. "What shall I do now, my master, Conchobar?" said Cuchulainn to the king [Conchobar Mac Nessa]. "You will go", said Conchobar, "to the same rock again". Cuchulainn, therefore, went till he reached the same rock again, where he saw the woman with the green cloak coming towards him. "That is well, O Cuchulainn!" said she. "It is not well", said he. "What was your business with me last year?" said Cuchulainn. "It was not to injure you we came", said she, "but to seek your friendship. I have come now", said she, "from Fand, the daughter of Aedh Abrat, who has been abandoned by Manannan Mac Lir, and who has fallen in love with you; Libán is my own name, and I salute you from my husband, Labraid of the quick hand at sword, who will give you the woman in marriage for your assistance to him in one day's battle against Senach the distorted, Eochaidh n-Iuil, and Eoghan I bhir". "I am not well able to fight this day", said Cuchulainn. "Short is the time until you are", said Libán. "You will be quite restored; and what you have lost of your strength will be increased to you. You ought to do this for my husband Labraid", said she, "because he is one of the best champions amongst the warriors of the world". "Where is he?" said Cuchulainn. "He is in Magh Mell, [i.e. 'the Plains of Happiness']", said she. "It is better that I depart now", said Libán. "Be it so", said Cuchulainn; "and let my charioteer, Laegh, go along with you to see the country". Laegh was accordingly conducted to a certain island, where he was well received by Labraid "of the quick hand at sword". He then returned to Cuchulainn, and (in a very curious poem of twenty-eight stanzas) he describes to him his journey and Labraid's court. Cuchulainn himself then goes to visit the lady Fand, and to fight the battle for her brother Labraid; which they won.

Meanwhile, continues the story, the lady Emer, Cuchulainn's most cherished of women, was pining in grief and jealousy at her court at Dun-delca (now Dundalk); but, unable to brook her miseries in silence any longer, she at last repaired to

LECT. IX.

The Story of
Cuchulainn
and the Lady
Eithné (circa A.D. 1.)

LECT. IX.

Emania, to King Conchobar, to crave his assistance for the recovery of her husband, who was now living with the lady Fand in Fairyland. Just at this time Manannan Mac Lir, the famous Tuatha Dé Danann (fairy)-chief, the former husband, as we have seen, of the lady Fand, repented his repudiation of her, and came and invited her to accompany him back to his court in the isle of Manainn, (now Man, which bears his name), to which she consented. Cuchulainn, upon her desertion, seems to have lost his senses, and fled in a delirious rage to the mountains, where he remained for a long time without eating or drinking. Emer, therefore, informed King Conchobar of his condition, and Conchobar, we are told, sent the poets, scholars, and Druids of Ulster to seek out the champion, and bring him to Emania. He thereupon attempted to kill them, but they pronounced "Druidic orations" against him, until he was caught by the hands and feet, when at length a glimpse of his senses returned to him. He was then taken to Emania, where, as he was begging for a drink, the Druids gave him a "drink of oblivion", and the moment he drank it he forgot Fand and all that had happened. The Druids then gave Emer also a drink, "to cause oblivion of her jealousy"; for she was in a state of madness hardly less extravagant than that of her husband. And finally, when Manannan was going off with his wife Fand, it is stated that he "shook his cloak between her and Cuchulainn", so that they should never again meet. "And this", continues the tract from which I quote, "was the vision of bewitching Cuchulainn, by the Aes Sidhe, or dwellers in the hills; for the demoniac power was great before the introduction of the Christian faith, and so great was it, that they (that is, the demons) used to tempt the people in human bodies, and that they used to show them secrets and places of happiness, where they should be immortal, and it was in that way they were believed. And it is these phantoms that the unlearned people call Sidhe or fairies, and Aes Sidhé or fairy people".

This curious and very ancient medley of Druidism and fairyism I have abridged from the ancient Leabhar na-h-Uidhré, so often referred to in these lectures. I have given it at greater length than the plan of the present lecture would, perhaps, strictly warrant; but as it affords a fair specimen of true ancient fairy doctrine, as well as an instance of Druidism, as described in a very ancient writing, I trust the digression will not be thought too long.

The Story of
Lughaidh
Reo-derg.

The next example of a druidical performance that presents itself has reference also to Cuchulainn's time; for the young prince Lughaidh Reo-derg, (Lughaidh "the red-striped"), grand-

The Sidhe, or Aes-Sidhe,— now called
"Fairies."

son of the monarch Eochaidh Feidhlech, was educated in literature and the science of arms by Cuchulainn. This druidical story (one of the most curious in detail which remains to us) runs as follows:

LECT. IX.
The Story of
Lughaidh
Reo-derg.

"A meeting of the four great provinces of Erin was held at this time (at Teamair), to see if they could find a person whom they could select, to whom they would give the sovereignty of Erin; for they thought it ill that the Hill of Sovereignty of Erin, that is Teamair, should be without the rule of a king in it; and they thought it ill that the people should be without the government of a king, to administer justice to them in all their territories. For the men of Erin had been without the government of a monarch upon them during the space of seven years, after the death of Conairé Mór, at Bruighin Da Derga, [Brudin Da Derca] until this great meeting of the four great provinces of Erin, at Teamair of the kings, in the court of Erc, son of Cairbré [or Coirpre] Niadh-fear.

"These were the (provincial) kings who were present in this meeting, namely, Medhbh (or Meave), queen of Connacht, and Ailill, her consort; Curoi (Mac Dairé), king of South Munster; Tighernach Tethannach, son of Luchta, king of North Munster; and Fínd or Finn Mac Rossa, king of Leinster. These men would not hold kingly counsel with the men of Ulster at all, because they were unitedly opposed to the Ulstermen.

"There was a Bull-feast made by them there, in order that they might learn through it who the person was to whom they would give the sovereignty. This is the way in which that bull-feast was made, namely, a bull was killed, and one man eat enough of its flesh and of its broth; and he slept under that meal; and a true oration was pronounced by four Druids upon him; and he saw in his dream the appearance of the man who would be made king of them, his countenance and description, and how he was occupied. The man screamed out of his sleep, and told what he had seen to the kings, namely, a soft youth, noble, and powerfully made, with two red stripes on his skin around his body, and he standing at the pillow of a man who was lying in a decline at Emain Macha, (the royal palace of Ulster).

"The kings then sent messengers immediately to Emania, where the Ultonians were assembled round Conchobar, (their king), at this time; and Cuchulainn was lying in a decline there", (as stated in the story the substance of which was given in the last lecture). The messengers told their tale to Conchobar and to the nobles of Ulster. "There is indeed with us", said Conchobar, "a noble; well-descended youth of that description, namely, Lugaidh Reo-derg, 'the son of the three twins', Cuchulainn's pupil, who now sits over his pillow yonder, as you see, cheering his tutor".

LECT. IX.

The tale goes on to say that Cuchulainn then arose, and delivered a valedictory address to his pupil, (a very curious piece), chiefly on the conduct which should distinguish him in his new character of monarch; after which Lugaidh repaired to Teamair, where he was fully recognized as the person described in the vision, and proclaimed as monarch; after which the assembly broke up.

This Lugaidh was the father of the monarch Crimhthann Niadhnair, who had a famous court at Beinn Edair,—(now the Hill of Howth, the site of the court being that of the present "Baily" Light-House, according to Doctor Petrie),—where he died and was buried; and it was in the ninth year of his reign that our Saviour is supposed to have been born.

Of Cathbadh,
the celebrated Druid of King Con-chobar Mac Nessa, and his School.

At the time of which we are speaking, that is, about the time of the Incarnation of our Lord, Cathbadh, of the province of Ulster, and chief or royal Druid to king Conchobar, at Emania, was perhaps the most celebrated professor of the Druidic order in Erin. There are a great many references to this Cathbadh in his Druidic character, but of these I shall content myself with one only, and translate from the ancient history of the Táin Bo Chuailgné (cattle spoil of Chuailgné) a short extract:

One day that Cathbadh was outside Emania, on the north-east, lecturing his pupils, who numbered one hundred, (that being the number which Cathbadh taught), he was questioned by one of them as to the signs and omens of the day, whether they were for good or for evil, and for what undertaking that day would be propitious. The Druid answered that the fame and renown of the youth who should take arms upon that day should last in Erin "go brath"—that is, in Erin "for ever". Cuchulainn, the great hero of the cow-spoil, of whom so much has been said, and who was one of the pupils, immediately begged of his master to recommend him to the king as a candidate for championship, or knighthood, as we should now call it, to which Cathbadh assented. Cuchulainn then repaired to the king, and in the proper manner solicited him for the arms of a champion. "Who instructed you to seek them?" said Conchobar. "Cathbadh", said the youth. "You shall have them", said the king; and Conchobar then presented him with a sword, a shield, and two spears,—a form which constituted him thenceforth a knight or champion at arms.

From this extract we may see what the character of Cathbadh's school was,—it was evidently one of those institutions so often referred to in our ancient writings, an academy for instruction, not only in poetry and Druidism, but also in military accomplishments.

L.EOT. IX.

That the Druids shared largely in the instruction of the youth of Erinn, of all classes, in ancient times, could be shown from innumerable passages in our old writings, (to which I shall make further allusion before I leave the subject); but one remarkable instance, from the ancient Tripartite Life of St. Patrick, will be sufficient for the present. According to this most ancient authority, St. Patrick, having overcome and confounded the monarch Laeghairé's chief Druids at Tara, passed over the Shannon into Connacht, to prosecute his apostolic labours. Now, at this period, it happened that at Magh Ai, (a district of which the modern county of Roscommon forms part), in the royal palace of Cruachain, there resided two other of king Laeghairé's Druids, the brothers Muel and Coplaít; and that, to their joint tuition the monarch had committed his two beautiful daughters,—Eithne, “the fair”, and Fedelín, “the rosy”. When the Druids, in whose charge the king's daughters were brought up, heard of St. Patrick's coming into their country, and of his success against the Druids at Tara and elsewhere, they resorted to their magical arts to defeat him, and by an exertion of their demoniac power, brought a dense darkness over the whole of Magh Ai during the space of three days and three nights. Patrick, however, prayed to God, and blessed the plain; and it so befell that the Druids alone remained involved in the darkness, while all the rest of the people had the light restored to them.

The Druids
as Teachers in ancient
Erinn.

Shortly after this, the saint, we are told, came to the palace of Cruachain; and the following incident, which is related to have occurred on the occasion, throws a curious light on the sort of theological education which the young princesses received from their Druidic preceptors. Thus says the Life:

“Patrick then repaired to the fountain called Clíbech, at the side of Cruachain, at the rising of the sun. The clergy sat at the fountain; and while they were there the two princesses, the daughters of Laeghairé Mac Neill, came at an early hour to the fountain, to wash, as was their custom; and encountering the assembly of the clergy at the fountain in their white vestments, and with their books before them, they wondered much at their appearance. They thought that they might be men from the hills, i.e. fairy-men, or phantoms. They questioned Patrick, therefore, saying: ‘Whence have ye come? whither do ye go? are ye men of the hills? or are ye gods?’ To which Patrick answered: ‘It would be better for you to believe in God than

LEBOT. X.

and unsettled wanderer. This wisp or handful was called Dlui Fulla, or "fluttering wisp".

The first reference that I find to the exercise of this piece of Druidism, goes as far back as the time of Nuadha Fullon, one of the early kings of Leinster, who flourished so long since as about 600 years B.C. It is stated in an ancient tract on the etymology of ancient Gaelic surnames, that this Nuadha Fullon had received the addition of Fullon to his first name on account of his having been educated by a celebrated Druid named Fullon, who was the first person that practised the art of pronouncing druidical incantations on a wisp of straw or hay, of such a character as that, when thrown in any one's face, it caused him to run, jump, or flutter about, like a lunatic. And this was the origin of the Dlui Fulla, or Fullon's "fluttering wisp".

The Story of Prince Comgan; (vii.
century).

The second reference is to the affecting case of the young prince Comgan, son of Maelochtair, king of the Decies,—the king who bestowed the site of the great ecclesiastical establishment of Lismore, in the county of Waterford, on St. Mochuda, who died in the year 636.

Comgan was the son of Maelochtair by his first wife, and was remarkable for beauty of person, grace, and manly accomplishments. His stepmother, (for Maelochtair remarried when advanced in life), who was much younger than his father, conceived a criminal passion for him, and made advances which he rejected with horror; upon which her love was converted into the most deadly hatred, and she sought anxiously for an opportunity to be revenged upon him. Now it so happened that, on one occasion, a fair and assembly having been held by the men of Munster, in South Tipperary, prince Comgan carried off the victory in all the sports and exercises of the day, and won the applause of all spectators. His father's Druid was especially delighted with his prowess, and celebrated his praises above all the rest. The malicious stepmother, seeing this, accosted the Druid, and said to him, "You are the last person who ought to praise Comgan, for he is in love with your wife, and has access to her at his pleasure. Observe him when he rides around to receive the congratulations of the fair ladies, and you will see that your wife regards him with peculiar favour". "If this be so", said the Druid, "his power of acquiring favour with her, or any other woman, shall soon cease for ever".

Soon after, Comgan came up at the head of a troop of cavalry and rode around the assembly, according to custom, to receive the congratulations of the fair ladies who were witnesses of his success; and he addressed to each some courteous words, and to the Druid's wife among the rest. Although the unsuspicious Comgan in reality paid no more court to her than to others, yet to the Druid's eyes, already filled with jealousy, his passing compliment seemed an undoubted confirmation of all the suspicions with which his mind had been poisoned; and when Comgan retired to wash his horses and himself in a neighbouring stream, the Druid followed him, and suddenly, we are told, struck him with a druidic wand, or, according to one version, flung at him a tuft of grass over which he had pronounced a druidical incantation. The result, according to the story, was, that when Comgan arose from bathing his flesh burst forth in boils and ulcers, and his attendants were forced to carry him to his father's house. At the end of the year he had wasted away; his hair fell off; his intellect decayed; and he became a bald, senseless, and wandering idiot, keeping company only with the fools and mountebanks of his father's court.

Such was said to have been the fate of prince Comgan, brought about by apparently a very simple druidic process. This Comgan was brother, by his mother's side, to the holy bishop St. Cummain Fada ("Cummain the Tall"), of Clonsilla, in the county of Galway, who died A.D. 661, and of whose history and life the full particulars will be found collected in Dr. Todd's Notes to the first part of the Liber Hymnorum, lately published by the Archaeological Society.

There is yet another curious instance of the use of the magic wisp, recorded as having occurred shortly before the period just referred to; one which I cannot omit as an illustration of this form of Druidism, because the account is one given with so much detail.

The simple incident itself could be told in a few words, but it would scarcely be intelligible without some account, (which shall be as condensed as I can make it), of the circumstances which led to it. And first a few words as to the Deisi clans,—for this tale also is connected with their eventful history.

The Deisis (Decies or Deasys) of Munster, just mentioned, were originally a tribe located in the present barony of Deisi, or Deece, in Meath, which derives its name from them. They were the descendants of Fiacha Suidhé, (brother to the monarch Conn of the Hundred Battles,) and his followers. One of the chiefs of this people was Ængus Gae-buaifnech, (Ængus "of the Poisoned Spear"), a valiant and high-minded man, and the champion of his tribe at the time their cousin Cormac Mac Airt was monarch of Erin. Cormac had, besides Cairbré Lifeachair, his successor in the monarchy, another son named Ceallach, or "the Diviner". This Ceallach took away, by force or fraud,

The Story of
the Princess
Eithné Uathach
and the Deisi; and of the Druid
Dill.

LECT. X.
The Story of
the Princess
Eithné Uath-
ach and the Decies; and of the Druid
Dill.

a young lady of Æengus's people, who was also a near relative of his own. Æengus, enraged, followed the offender to Tara itself, entered the royal palace, and killed Ceallach in the very presence of his father the king, after which the champion escaped unhurt. King Cormac, however, immediately prepared for vengeance, and raised a force sufficient to drive the Decies out of Meath southward into Leinster, in which province they sojourned for some time, and from which they afterwards passed into Munster to king Oilioll Olum, who was married to Sadhbh, one of the three daughters of Conn of the Hundred Battles, and consequently cousin to the Decian chief. Oilioll Olum gave them the territory which still bears their name, in the present county of Waterford; and here and in other parts of Munster they remained for about two hundred years, until the reign of Æengus, son of Nadfraech, king of Munster, who was converted and baptized by St. Patrick. It is to about this latter period that the events recorded in the following story are referred.

About this time the Decies felt the need of a more extensive territory, to meet the wants of their growing numbers. They accordingly consulted, we are told, their Druid, who told them that the wife of Crimhthann, king of Leinster, was then pregnant; that she should bring forth a daughter; that they should contrive to procure that daughter in fosterage; and that when she should get married, her husband would extend their territory. All was done according to the Druid's directions. The Decies received the young princess, whose name was Eithné, in fosterage; and under their assiduous care she grew up to become eminent for ability as well as beauty. Some of our old romances assert that her growth was promoted by her being fed on the flesh of infants, from which she got the nickname of Eithné Uathach, or "the Hateful"; the only allusion that I am aware of to any instance of similar barbarity;—for as to the existence of cannibalism to any extent whatever among the Gaedhils, even in the most remote ages, I am bound to declare at once that there is no vestige of authority whatever. However, be this shocking story of the princess Eithné as it may, having now grown to womanhood, she attracted the notice of Æengus, king of Munster, who sought her hand in marriage. His suit was promoted by the Decies, and gladly accepted by her father, and they were forthwith married; after which Æengus did grant the Decies an addition of territory, lying north of the river Suir, in the present county of Tipperary, provided they drove out some tribes from the neighbouring district of Ossory, who had some time previously settled themselves in it.

Now, these Ossorians had a famous blind Druid named Dill, the son of Ui Creaga. And Dill had a daughter who attached herself to the person of the newly-married Eithné, queen of Cashel, who in return provided her with a husband of the Decies, and a settlement at her court. "Good, now", said the queen to her one day, "your father is not kind to our people the Decies". "I have not the power to change him", said the Druid's daughter. "Go from me", said the queen, "with rich presents to him, to know if he will consent to turn away his enmity from us; and you shall also have an additional reward for yourself".

The Story of the Princess Eithné Uathach and the Deisi; and of the Druid Dill.

The daughter (the tale tells us) accordingly proceeded southwards from Cashel, and so reached her father's residence. "Whence have you come, my daughter?" said the Druid. "From Cashel", said she. "Is it true that you are attached to that hateful queen, Eithné?" said he. "It is true", said she. "Good, now, Dill", said she, "I am come to offer you wealth". "I will not accept it", said he. "I will light a fire for you", said she, "that you may eat, and that I may obtain your blessing". He raised his voice then, and said: "These (meaning the Deisi) are a bad swarm, who have planted themselves on the borders of the territory of Cashel; but", said he, "they shall depart at mid-day to-morrow. I am preparing incantations", said he: "the Inneóin (the name of a town at a certain hill near Clonmel) shall be burned on to-morrow; I shall be on the west side of the hill, and I shall see the smoke; a hornless red cow shall be sent past them, to the west; they shall raise a universal shout, after which they shall fly away; and they shall never occupy the land again". "Good", said the daughter; "sleep, now, when you please". He then slept; and the daughter stole the wisp of straw out of his shoes, and fled with it to Cashel, and gave it to queen Eithné, who immediately set out with it to the south, and stopped not until she reached the Decies, at their town of Inneóin. "Here", said she to the Decies, "burn this wisp, and procure for us a hornless red cow". Such a cow could not be procured. Upon which one of the Druids of the Decies said: "I will put myself into the form of the cow to be slain, on condition that my children be made free for ever". This was done; and the red cow passed westwards.

The Druid Dill, who at some distance was watching the effect, as he thought, of his own spells, now addressed his attendant: "What is doing now?" said he. "A fire is being lighted", said the attendant, "and a hornless red cow has been sent over the ford from the east side". "That is not desirable", said Dill; "is the wisp here?" said he. "It is not", said the attendant. "Bad", said the Druid; "do the men wound the cow?" "They have let her pass, but the horseboys are wounding her"; said the attendant. "What shout is this I hear?" said the Druid. "The shout of the horseboys killing the cow", said the attendant. "Yoke my chariot for me", said the Druid, "the town cannot be damaged, nor can we withstand it". The Decies rushed past him eastwards; the Ossorians were attacked and routed; they fled like wild deer, and they were followed till they reached a place called Luininn, where the close of the day put an end to the pursuit; and this place became the boundary for ever after between Munster and Leinster. And the Ossorians, concludes the tale, who were previously called the descendants of Bresal Belach, after a remote ancestor of theirs, were from this time down called Ossairghé, from Os, a wild deer, and the wild-deer-like precipitance of their retreat.

LECT. X.

Of the Imbas Forosnai, or "Illumination" by the Palms of the Hands.

The next instance of Druidism in the selection I have made is that of a peculiar rite of divination, which it seems might be performed by either a Druid or a Poet; it is described in the Glossary of the holy Cormac MacCullinan, King and Bishop of Cashel, compiled about the year 890. The article is an explanation of the words Imbas Forosnai, or (literally) "Illumination by the Palms of the Hands". At this word (Imbas Forosnai) he says: "This describes to the Poet what thing soever he wishes to discover; and this is the manner in which it is performed: The Poet chews a bit of the raw red flesh of a pig, a dog, or a cat, and then retires with it to his bed, behind the door, where he pronounces an oration upon it, and offers it to his idol gods. He then invokes his idols; and if he has not received the 'illumination' before the next day, he pronounces incantations upon his two palms, and takes his idol gods unto him (into his bed), in order that he may not be interrupted in his sleep. He then places his two hands upon his two cheeks, and falls asleep. He is then watched, so that he be not stirred or interrupted by any one, until every thing that he seeks is revealed to him, at the end of a day, or two, or three, or as long as he continues at his offering; and hence it is that this ceremony is called Palm Illumination, that is, his two hands upon him, crosswise, that is, a hand over and a hand hither upon his cheeks. And Saint Patrick prohibited this ceremony, because it is a species of Teinm Laeghdha; that is, he declared any one who performed it should have no place in Heaven, nor on Earth". Such was the Imbas Forosnai.

The Fileadh, ("poets", or rather "philosophers", as they ought more properly to be called), had another very curious secret and druidical rite for the identification of dead persons, such as those who had been beheaded or dismembered. This art was called Teinm Laeghdha, that is, the "Illumination" of Rhymes. When the performance of this art was accompanied by a Sacrifice to, or an Invocation of, Idols, it was called Teinm Laeghdha, or the Illumination of Rhymes, and came under Saint Patrick's prohibition; but when not so accompanied, it was called Dichetal do Chennaibh, or the Great Extempore Recital, and was not prohibited.

LECT. X.
Of the Teinm Laeghdha, ("Illumination" of Rhymes) of the Fleadh; and of the Dichetal do Chennaibh.

Of the Teinm Laeghdha we have at least two instances on record, of nearly equal date, and referred back to the second and third centuries of the Christian era.

In one of those instances the celebrated Finn Mac Cumhaill was the performer; for Finn, as was shown in a former lecture, was a Poet and a Philosopher, as well as a Champion or knight-at-arms. Finn, from his infancy, was intended for the military profession, and in compliance with the Fenian rules must have studied philosophy, and letters also, to a certain extent; but after having made his profession of arms, and received a high appointment at the court of Tara, from the monarch Conn of the Hundred Battles, the young champion became involved in an affair of some delicacy with one of the king's daughters, which made it prudent for him to retire awhile from court. Abandoning, then, for a time, his military course, he placed himself under the tuition of Cethern Mac Fintain, a celebrated Poet, Philosopher, and Druid, under whose instructions he is said to have soon made himself perfect in occult studies. This curious statement is preserved in a very ancient poem, a copy of which is to be found in the Book of Leinster.

The account, however, in which Finn's performance of the Teinm Laeghdha is recorded, is preserved in Cormac's Glossary, at the word Orc Treith, and may be shortly told as follows:

The Story of Finn Mac Cumhaill and Lomna.

Finn, at the time that we are speaking of, had to wife a lady of the tribe of Luighné (now Lune, in Meath); and he had in his household a favourite wit or buffoon, named Lomna. Now Finn chanced to go on one occasion on a hunting excursion into Teaffia (in Westmeath), accompanied by his wife, and attended by his domestics and his buffoon, whom he left in a temporary house or hut in that country, while he himself and the chief part of his warriors followed the chase. One day, during Finn's absence, Lomna the buffoon discovered Cairbré, one of Finn's warriors, holding a rather suspicious conversation with Finn's wife. The lady prayed him earnestly to conceal her indiscretion, and Lomna reluctantly promised her to do so. Finn returned after some time, and Lomna felt much troubled at being obliged to conceal a secret of such importance; and at last, unable any longer to do so, he shaped himself a quadrangular wand, and cut the following words, in ogham characters, in it: "An alder stake in a palisade of silver; a sprig of hellebore in a bunch of cresses; the willing husband of an unfaithful wife among a select band of tried warriors; heath upon the bare hill of Ualannin Luighné". Lomna then placed the wand in a place where Finn was sure to find it. Finn soon did find it, and immediately understood its metaphorical contents, which gave him no small uneasiness. Nor did his wife long remain ignorant of the discovery, which she immediately attributed to Lomna; so she forthwith sent privately for her favourite to come and kill the buffoon; and Cairbré came, accordingly, and cut off Lomna's head, and carried it away with him. Afterwards Finn came, in the evening, to Lomna's hut, where he found the headless body. "Here is a body without a head", said Finn. "Discover for us", said the Fians, his warriors, "whose it is". And then, says the legend, Finn put his thumb into his mouth, and spoke through the power of the Teinm Laeghdha, and said:—

LECT. X.

"He has not been killed by people;—

He has not been killed by the people of Luighné;—

He has not been killed by a wild boar;—

He has not been killed by a fall:—

He has not died on his bed,—Lomna!

"This is Lomna's body", said Finn; "and enemies have carried away his head".

This piece of sorcery differs in one instance from any other that we know of; namely, that instead of a bit of any other kind of flesh, Finn chews his own thumb, which, of course, he thus makes his sacrifice to his idols.

The Story of
Mogh Eimhé.

Another instance of the Teinm Laeghdha occurs also in Cormac's Glossary, at the word Mogh Eimhé ("the Slave of the Haft"); and though this story will seem in this place a little longer than I should wish, still, as it contains other curious and important historical facts, I am tempted to give a translation of it at length.

"Mogh Eimhé", says Cormac, "was the name of the first Oirené, or lap-dog, that was known in Erin. Cairbré Musc was the man who first brought it into Erin, out of the country of Britain. For at this time the power of the Gaedhils was great over the Britons; and they divided Albion among them in farms, and each of them had his neighbour and friend among the people; and they dwelt no less on the east side of the sea, than in Scotia",—[that is, the land of the Scots or Gaedhils, a term then only applied to Erin]. "And they built their residences and their royal Duns (or courts) there; as, for instance, Dun Tradin, or Dun Tredin, [the three-walled court] of Críomhthann Mór Mac Fíodhaidh, monarch of Erin and Albain [Scotland], as far as the Ictian sea; and also Glastimberí [Glastonbury], now a church on the brink of the Ictian sea, in the forest of which dwelt Glas Mac Cais, swine-herd to the king of Irfuaté, to feed his pigs on the mast,—the same who was resuscitated by St. Patrick six score years after he had been slain by Mac Con's huntsmen. And one of these divisions [of land] is Dun Map Lethan, at this day, [A.D. 890], in the country of the Britons of Cornwall; that is Dun Mac Liathain. And so, every tribe of them [i.e. of the Scots, or Gaedhils of Erin] divided the lands into portions on the east side of the channel; and so it continued for a long time after the coming of St. Patrick into Erin.

"It was on this account, therefore, that Cairbré Muse was in the habit of going over frequently to visit his family and his friends. Down to this time no lap-dog had come into the country of Erin, and the Britons commanded that none should ever be given, either for satire, or for friendship, or for price, to the Gaedhils.

"The law which was then in force in Britain was, that every transgressor became forfeited for his transgression, if discovered.

"At this time a friend of Cairbré Muse was possessed of a celebrated lap-dog in the country of Britain; and Cairbré procured it from him in the following manner. Cairbré went on a visit to this man's house, and was received with a welcome to every thing but the lap-dog. Now Cairbré had a costly knife, the handle of which was ornamented with gold and silver; a most precious jewel. In the course of the night he rubbed the knife and its haft thickly over with fat bacon and fat beef, and laid it at the lap-dog's mouth, and then went to sleep. The dog continued to gnaw the knife until morning; and when Cairbré arose in the morning, and found the knife disfigured, he made loud complaints, appeared very sorrowful, and demanded justice for it from his friend; namely, 'the transgressor in forfeit for his transgression'. The dog was accordingly given up to him, then, in satisfaction for its crime; and thus it received the name of Mogh Eimhé, or 'the Slave of the Haft', from mogh, a slave, and eimh, a haft.

"It so happened that dog was a female, and was with young at the time of its being brought over. Ailill Flann Beg was the king of Munster at the time, and Cormac Mac Airt monarch of Tara. Each of these claimed the dog, but it was agreed that she should remain for a certain time, alternately, in the houses of Cairbré himself, and of each of the two kings. In the meantime the dog brought forth her whelps; and each of the royal personages took one of them; and it was from this little dog that sprang all the breed of lap-dogs in Erin. The lap-dog died in a long time after; and in many years after that, again, Connla the son of Tadg, son of Cian, son of Oilioll Olum, king of Munster, found the bare skull of the lap-dog, and brought it for identification to Maen Mac Etnae, a distinguished poet, who had come with a laudatory poem to his father.

LECT. X.

"The poet had recourse to his Teinm Laeghdha; and he said:

"Sweet was your drink in the house of Eogan's grandson;
Sweet was your flesh in the house of Conn's grandson
each day;
Fair was your bread in the house of Cairbré Musc,
O Mogh Eimhé!"

"This", said the Poet, "is the skull of Mogh Eimhé, the first lap-dog that was ever brought into Erin."

Cairbré Musc, by whom, by no very fair means, this first Oirné or lap-dog was brought into Erin, was son of Conairé, monarch of Erin. He fought at the battle of Ceann Abrait, A.D. 186; and he was ancestor to the O'Connells, the O'Falveys, the O'Sheas, and other families of ancient distinction in West Munster, as well as of others in East Munster.

So much for the Teinm Laeghdha, which seems to have been a charm of rhyme, by which it was supposed that the rhymers would be led to name the name of that which he sought by a sort of magic inspiration, the nature of which is not indicated to us save by such examples as that contained in this short legend.

The Story of the Siege of
Drom Damhghairé;
Druidic Fire.

To this period may be also referred another occurrence of ancient historic interest, namely, the Siege or Encampment of Drom Damhghairé, of which some account was given in a former lecture<sup>(171)</sup>, and in the Historic Tale concerning which some wild druidical performances are described in some detail. To this Tale, therefore, as containing another series of examples of what was called Druidical Art, I have next to refer.

The Encampment of Drom Damhghairé took place under the following circumstances. The celebrated Cormac Mac Airt commenced his reign as monarch of Erin at Tara, A. D. 213. It would appear that his hospitality and munificence soon exhausted the royal revenues, so that in a short time he found it necessary not only to curtail his expenditure, but to seek immediate means of replenishing his coffers. In this difficulty he was advised to make a claim on the province of Munster for a double tribute, on the plea that although there were properly two provinces of Munster, yet they had never paid more than the tribute of one. Cormac, therefore, on these very questionable grounds, sent his messengers into Munster to demand a second tribute for the same year. Fiacha Muilleathan (the son of Eoghan Mór, son of Oilioll Oluim) was king of Munster at the time, and he received the messengers of the monarch (at Cnoc Raffann, in Tipperary) with all the usual honours and attention. He denied the justness of Cormac's demands, but offered to send a sufficient supply of provisions to him as a present, for that occasion. The messengers returned to Tara with this answer, but Cormac would not listen to it, and he consulted his Druids on the probable success of an expedition into Munster. They, however, after having recourse (as we are told) to their divinations, gave him an unfavourable answer. Still, he would not be persuaded by them, but insisted on undertaking the expedition. He therefore mustered a large force, and marched directly to the hill of Damhghairé (now Cnoc Luíngé, or Knocklong, in the south-east part of the county of Limerick, bordering on Tipperary). Here Cormac fixed his camp; and from this, with the aid of his Druids, by drying up the springs and streams of the province, he is said to have brought that great distress on the people of Munster which was described in a former lecture.<sup>(172)</sup> Ultimately, the monarch and his Druids were overmastered by the superior power of the great Munster Druid, Mogh Ruith. This celebrated sage, one of the most renowned of those ages, is recorded to have completed his Druidical studies in the east, in the school of no less a master than Simon Magus; and it is even stated in this tract, that Simon Magus himself was of the race of the Gaedhils of Erin.

(171) Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 271.

After Magh Ruith had relieved the men of Munster from the drought and famine which Cormac's Druids had brought upon them, Cormac again took into council his chief and oldest Druid, Ciothruadh, and inquired of him what was best to be done. Ciothruadh answered, that their last and only resource was to make a druidic fire against the enemy. "How is that to be made?" said Cormac. "In this way," said Ciothruadh: "let our men go into the forest, and let them cut down and carry out loads of the quickbeam, (i.e. the Mountain-Ash, or Roan-tree), of which large fires must be made; and when the fires are lighted, if the smoke goes southwards, then it will be well for you to press after it on the men of Munster; and if it is

LECT. X.

The Story of the Siege of Drom Damh-ghairé;
Druidic Fire.

<sup>(172)</sup> Lectures on the MS. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 272.

LECT. X.

The Story of
the Siege of
Drom Damh-ghairé;
Druidic Fire.

hither or northward the smoke comes, then, indeed, it will be full time for us to retreat with all our speed". So, Cormac's men forthwith entered the forest, cut down the wood indicated, brought it out, and set it on fire.

Whilst this was going on, Mogh Ruith, perceiving what the northern Druids were preparing for, immediately ordered the men of Munster to go into the wood of Lethard, and each man to bring out a faggot of the roan-tree in his hand; and that the king only should bring out a shoulder-bundle from the side of the mountain, where it had grown under three shelters, namely, shelter from the (north-east) March wind, shelter from the sea wind, and shelter from the conflagration winds. The men soon returned with the wood to their camp; and the Druid Ceannmhair, Mogh Ruith's favourite pupil, built the wood up in the shape of a small triangular kitchen, with seven doors; whereas the northern fire, (that prepared by Ciothruadh), on the other side, was but rudely heaped up, and had but three doors. "The fire is ready now", said Ceannmhair, "all but to light it". Mogh Ruith then ordered each man of the host to give him a shaving from the handle of his spear, which, when he had got, he mixed with butter and rolled up into a large ball, at the same time pronouncing those words in rhythmical lines:

"I mix a roaring powerful fire;

It will clear the woods; it will blight the grass;

An angry flame of powerful speed;

It will rush up to the skies above,

It will subdue the wrath of all burning wood,

It will break a battle on the clans of Conn";—

and with that he threw the ball into the fire, where it exploded with a tremendous noise.

"I shall bring the rout on them now", said Mogh Ruith; "let my chariot be ready, and let each man of you have his horse by the bridle; for, if our fires incline but ever so little northwards, follow and charge the enemy". He then blew his druidical breath (says this strange tale) up into the sky, and it immediately became a threatening black cloud, which came down in a shower of blood upon the plain of Cláiré before him, and moved onwards from that to Tara, the Druid all the time pronouncing his rhythmical incantations. When the rushing of the bloody shower was heard in the northern camp, Cormac asked his Druid, Ciothruadh, what noise it was. "A shower of blood", said the Druid, "which has been produced by a violent effort of Druidism. It is upon us its entire evil will fall".

After this, (the tale proceeds), Mogh Ruith said to his people: "What is the condition of the flames from the two fires now?"

[for Mogh Ruith was blind]. "They are", said they, "chasing each other over the brow of the mountain, west and north, down to Druim Asail,—[now Tory Hill, near Croom, in the county of Limerick,]—and to the Shannon, and back again to the same place". He asked again the state of the flames. "They are in the same condition", said they; "but they have not left a tree in the plain of middle Munster that they have not burned". Mogh asked again how the flames were. His people answered that "they had risen up to the clouds of Heaven, and were like two fierce angry warriors chasing each other". Then Mogh Ruith called for his "dark-gray hornless bull-hide", and "his white-speckled bird-headpiece, with its fluttering wings", and also "his druidic instruments", and he flew up into the air to the verge of the fires, and commenced to beat and turn them northwards. When Cormac's Druid, Ciothruadh, saw this, he also ascended to oppose Mogh Ruith; but the power of the latter prevailed, and he turned the fires northwards, and into Cormac's camp, where they fell, as well as [i.e. where also fell] the Druid Ciothruadh. Cormac, on this, ordered a quick retreat out of the province.

They were hotly pursued, (we are then told), by the Munster men, led by Mogh Ruith in his chariot drawn by wild oxen, and with his druidic bull-hide beside him. The pursuit continued beyond the border of the province, and into Magh Raighné, in Ossory. And here Mogh Ruith asked, though he well knew, who were the nearest parties to them of the retreating foe. "They are three tall gray-headed men", said they. "They are Cormac's three Druids, Cecht, Ciotha, and Ciothruadh", said he, "and my gods have promised me to transform them into stones, when I should overtake them, if I could but blow my breath upon them". And then he "blew a druidic breath" upon them, so that they were turned into stones; "and these are the stones that are called the Flags of Raighné at this day"—and so on.

This extraordinary tale contains more of the wilder feats of Druidism than any other Irish piece known to me. But not only is the main fact recorded in it true, but some of the principal personages, at least, are historical; for it is a curious fact, that the great Druid, so celebrated in this piece, Mogh Ruith, for this or some other singular piece of druidic service rendered to the men of Munster, is recorded, in truly historic documents, to have received from them the extensive territory anciently known as Magh Meiné, or the "Mineral Plain", (now the district of Fermoy, in the county of Cork); a territory which the race of Mogh Ruith, moreover, continue to inhabit even to this

LECT. X.

The Story of
the Siege of
Drom Damh-ghairé;
Druidic Fire.

LECT. X.

day, in the families of O'Dugan, O'Cronin, etc., of that and the neighbouring districts.

Use of the Roan, or Rowan-tree, in Druidical
rites,

The use of the quicken or roan-tree in druidical rites is a circumstance by no means incidental to this tale alone, since many of its uses for superstitious purposes may be found in our old writings, and some of them have come down even to the present day, in connection, for example, with the superstitions peculiar to the dairy. I have myself known some housewives in Munster who would not have a churn for their dairies without at least one roan-tree hoop on it,—or without having a twig of that sacred tree twisted into a gad, and formed into a ring placed upon the churn-staff while churning,—for the purpose of putting it out of the power (as they conceived) of some gifted neighbour, to deprive them of the proper quantity of butter, by any trick of witchery.

in the ordeal
by fire.

The following short article from an ancient manuscript (H. 3. 17, T.C.D.) is conclusive, on the use of the roan-tree in druidical rites. It is the case of a woman clearing her character from charges affecting it, by an ordeal, when she had failed to find living compurgators. The ordeal she was to go through was, to rub her tongue to a red-hot adze of bronze, or to melted lead (but not, it appears, to iron), and the adze should be heated in a fire of blackthorn, “or of roan-tree”; and this, says the book, was a druidical ordeal.

Of ancient Poetical Satire, as a branch of Druidism.

When St. Patrick had purified the laws and the course of education in Erin, in the ninth year of his mission (about the year 443), he, of course, prohibited all druidical rites and performances, but particularly those which required sacrifices to idols. He left, however, to the lawfully elected, territorial poet, liberty to write satires, according to ancient custom, upon the kings or chiefs in whose service he was retained, whenever the poet wrote an historical, a genealogical, or a laudatory poem for his patron, and was not paid for it the reward which custom or the law of the land had provided in such cases. How far the spirit of Druidism may have pervaded these compositions it is now out of our power to ascertain; but, considering the prevailing belief in the effects ascribed to them, it is very probable, to say the least, that in such incantations the satirical poet must have dealt largely in Druidism as known or practised in times not yet far removed from his own.

The Glam
Dichinn, or “Satire from the Hill-tops”.

Some curious, though apparently simple examples of this species of poetry have come down to us; and the following account of the ceremony of its composition, (from the Book of Ballymote), stands, perhaps, unique in the annals of satire. The composition was called Glam Dichinn, or Satire from the Hill-tops; and was made in this way. The poet was to fast upon the lands of the king for whom the poem was to be made; and the consent of thirty laymen, thirty ecclesiastics, (bishops, the tract says), and thirty poets, should be had to compose the satire; and it was a crime for them to prevent it when the reward for the poem was withheld. The poet, then, in a company of seven, (that is, six along with himself), upon whom had been conferred literary or poetic degrees,—namely, a “Fochlac”, a “MacFíurmedh”, a “Doss”, a “Cana”, a “Clí”, and an “Anrad”, with an “Ollamh” as the seventh, went at the rising of the sun to a hill, which should be situated on the boundary of seven farms, (or lands), and each of them was to turn his face to a different land; and the Ollamh’s face was to be turned towards the land of the king who was to be satirized; and their backs were to be turned to a hawthorn which should be growing upon the top of the hill; and the wind should be blowing from the north; and each man was to hold a perforated stone and a thorn of the hawthorn in his hand; and each man was to sing a verse of this composition for the king,—the Ollamh or chief poet to take the lead with his own verse, and the others in concert after him with theirs; and each, then, should place his stone and his thorn under the stem of the hawthorn; and if it was they that were in the wrong in the case, the ground of the hill would swallow them; and if it was the king that was in the wrong, the ground would swallow “him, and his wife, and his son, and his steed, and his robes, and his hound”. The satire of the Mac Fíurmedh fell on the hound; the satire of the Fochlac, on the robes; the satire of the Doss, on the arms; the satire of the Cana, on the wife; the satire of the Clí, on the son; the satire of the Anrad, on the steed; and the satire of the Ollamh, on the king.

This is a very singular instance of Druidism, as it was believed to have prevailed in Erin even after the introduction of Christianity.

It is now too late in the world’s age to canvass the power and nature of Satire; all that I can say on the subject is this: that from the remotest times down to our own, its power was dreaded in Erin; and that we have numerous instances on record of its having driven men out of their senses, and even to death itself.

Of the antiquity of satire in Erin, and of the belief in its venomous power, we have the very important authority of Cormac’s glossary, in which the word Gairé is explained and illustrated in the following manner:

“Gairé; that is, Gair-seclé (short life]; that is, Gair-ré; that

The Glam
Dichinn, or Satire, of the Poet Neidhe;
(from Cormac’s Glossary.)

LECT. X.

The Glam Dichinn, or satire, of the Poet Neidhé; (from Cormac's Glossary.)

is, re-ghair; ut est, in the satire which the poet Neidhé, son of Adhna, son of Guthar, composed for the king of Connacht, who was his own father's brother, namely Caier, the son of Guthor; for Caier had adopted Neidhé as his son, because he had no sons of his own.

"Caier's wife", (continues Cormac) "conceived a criminal passion for Neidhé, and offered him a ball of silver to purchase his love. Neidhé did not accept this, nor agree to her proposals, until she offered to make him king of Connacht after his uncle Caier. 'How can you accomplish that?' said Neidhé. 'It is not difficult', said she; 'make you a satire for him, until it produces a blemish upon him, and you know that a man with a blemish cannot retain the kingly rule'. 'It is not easy for me to do what you advise', said Neidhé, 'because the man would not refuse me anything; for there is not in his possession anything that he would not give me'. [The poets only fulminated their satires in case their privileges were violated, or their requests refused.] "'I know', said the woman, 'one thing that he would not give you, namely, the knife which was presented to him in the country of Albain [Scotland]; and that he would not give you because it is prohibited to him [i.e. because he is under a vow or pledge now] to give it away from himself'. Neidhé went then and asked Caier for the knife. 'Woe and alas', said Caier, 'it is prohibited to me to give it away from me'. Neidhé then", continues Cormac's authority, "composed a 'Glam Dichinn', or extempore satire for him; and immediately three blisters appeared upon his cheek". This is the satire:

" Evil, death, and short life to Caier;

May spears of battle slay Caier;

The rejected of the land and the earth is Caier;

Beneath the mounds and the rocks be Caier."<sup>(173)</sup>

Caier, we are then told, went early the next morning to the fountain to wash; and in passing his hands over his face, he found three blisters on it, which the satire had raised: namely, (says the story), "disgrace", "blemish", and "defect",—in colours of crimson, green, and white. On discovering his misfortune, he immediately fled, in order that no one who knew him should see his disgrace; and he did not stop until he reached Dun Cearmna, (now the Old Head of Kinsale, in the county of Cork), the residence of Caichear, son of Eidiregul, chief of that

<sup>(173)</sup> original:—maith, baime, gairne Caier;
cot m-beotup cealtup catae Caier;
oiba cae oipa, cae fupo Caier;
fumapa, focapa Caier.

district, where he was well received, as a stranger, though his quality was not known. Neidhé, the satirist, then assumed the sovereignty of Connacht, and continued to rule it for a year. LECT. X.

The conclusion of this strange story, (the historical meaning or foundation of which is now lost to us), is worth telling. After a year's enjoyment of his ill-gotten rank, Neidhé, it is said, began to repent of having unjustly caused so much misery to Caier, and having after some time discovered his retreat, he resolved to visit him. He set out accordingly in the favourite chariot of Caier, and accompanied by the king's treacherous wife; and he arrived in due time at Dun Cearmna. When the beautiful chariot arrived on the lawn of the Dun, its appearance was curiously examined by Caichear and his people. "I wonder who they are", said every one. Upon which Caier rose up and answered: "It is we that used to be driven in its champion's seat, in front of the driver's seat". "Those are the words of a king", said Caichear, the son of Eidersgul, who had not recognised Caier until then. "Not so, alas!" said Caier;—and he rushed through the house, and presently disappeared in a large rock which stood behind it, in a cleft of which he hid himself. Neidhé followed him through the house; and Caier's gray-hound, which accompanied him, soon discovered its master in the cleft of the rock behind the house. Neidhé approached him, but when Caier saw him he dropped dead of shame. The rock then "boiled", we are told, "blazed", and "burst", at the death of Caier; and a splinter of it entered one of Neidhé's eyes and broke it in his head; whereupon Neidhé composed an expiatory poem,—which is, however, omitted by Cormac, and by all the authorities that I am acquainted with.

This extravagant legend is valuable as exhibiting one of the earliest illustrations of that peculiar belief, in Erin, concerning the satire of a Poet, of which I have before given more than one less singular and more modern instance. This belief also may be taken to have preserved to us one of the traditions of that Druidism into whose mysteries we are unable to prosecute inquiries exact in detail.

I have now given instances of almost all the kinds of Druidism to which we find allusion in any of our Tales or any of our Historical pieces. And I shall add but one other example, which, as usual, I shall give in the form of an abridgment of the account itself, as it has been handed down to us. It is an instance of the mention of a Druid and some druidical operations of his, preserved in the history of the Dalcassian race of Thomond. The story is shortly as follows:—

The Story of the Druid
Lughaidh
Delbaeth, or
"the Fire-Producer",
the son of
Cas.

LECT. X.

The Story of the Druid
Lugaidh
Delbaeth, or
"the Fire-Producer",
the son of
Cas.

Cas, (from whom the Dalcassians derive their distinctive race-name), was the son of Conall "of the swift steeds", who was contemporary with the monarch Crimhthann, who died A.D. 379. Cas had twelve sons, from whom descend all the Dalcassian tribes; and of these twelve Lugaidh Delbaeth, (or Lugaidh "the Fire-producer"), was the twelfth. This Lugaidh had six sons; and one daughter, whose name was Aeifé. The sons were named: Gno Beg, Gno Mór, Baedan, Samtan, Aindelbadh, and Sighi. Lugaidh the Fire-producer had received a large territory from his father; and in time gave his daughter Aeifé in marriage to Trad, son of Tassach, who was a kingly chief and Druid, but without much land.

After some time Trad found himself the father of a numerous family, with but little provision for their support and advancement in life. Accordingly he said to his wife, Aeifé: "Go thou and ask a favour from thy father; it would be well for us and for our children to get more land". Aeifé, therefore, went and asked her father to grant her a favour. "Then Lugaidh consulted his oracles", says the writer of this account, "and said to his daughter: 'If thou shouldst order any one to leave his country now, he must depart without delay'. 'Depart thou, then', said she, 'and leave us the land which thou inheritest, that it may be ours in perpetuity'". Whereupon, we are told, Lugaidh her father immediately complied, and with his six sons left the inheritance assigned to him by his father to his daughter Aeifé and her husband Trad. And I may add that this territory, even to the present day, retains the name of Trad, forming, as it does, the deanery of Tradraidhé, in the present barony of Bunratty, county of Clare (a tract which comprises the parishes of Tuaimfinnlocha, Cill-ogh-na-Suloch, Cill Mailuighré, Cill Coirné, Cluain Lochain, Drom Lighin, Fiodhnach, Bunratty, and Cill Eoin, and the island of Inis-da-dhrom, in the river Fergus).

The story proceeds to inform us that the Druid Lugaidh, having been thus deprived of his inheritance by his selfish daughter, crossed the Shannon with his sons and his cattle, and passed into the south-western district of Westmeath, to Carn Fiachach; where Fiacha was buried, the son of the monarch Niall of the Nine Hostages, (ancestor of the families of Mac Eochagan, O'Mulloy, etc.). On arriving at this Carn he built up a large fire; and this, we are told, he ignited by his druidic power,—from which circumstance he acquired the title of Delbhaeth, or "the Fire-producer"; a name that to this day is preserved both in that of the territory and in the Tribe name of his principal descendants, the family of Mac Cochlann of Dealbhna, (now called Delvin), in Westmeath. The legend, however, does not stop here. From this fire we are told there burst forth five streams of flame, in five different directions; and the Druid commanded his five elder sons to follow one each of the fiery streams, assuring them that they would lead them to their future inheritances. The two elder sons, Gno Beg, and Gno Mor, accordingly followed their streams across the Shannon into Connacht, where they stopped in two territories, which retained these names down to the sixteenth century, when they were united under that of the Barony of Moycullen, in the county of Galway; a district of which Mac Conrai (a name now Anglicised King) was the chief in ancient times. The three other sons were led by their streams of fire to various parts of Westmeath, where they settled, and after whom those territories took the name of Dealbhna, (Anglicised the Delvins), from their father Delbaeth the Druid. Of these "Delvins", Dealbhna Ethra was the most important, of which Mac Coch-lann was the chief, whose residence was at the town now called Castletown-Delvin, in Westmeath; a house that preserved a considerable degree of rank and importance down even to our own times. Sighi, the sixth son of Lughaidh Delbaeth, remained in his father's neighbourhood; and it was to his son Nós that belonged the place in which the celebrated church of St. Ciaran of Chuain-muc-Nois was built. The field in which the church was built had been appropriated to the use of the hogs of Nós, son of Sighi, and was therefore called Chuain Muc Nóis, or the field of the hogs of Nós; and the present name of Clonmacnoise is but a slightly Anglicised corruption of the old name. In fine, the old Druid Lughaidh Delbaeth himself settled on the brink of a lake near Carn Fiacha,—which lake was thenceforward from him called Loch Lugh-phorta, or the lake of Lughaidh's Mansion;—and after his death his people buried him on the brink of this lake, and raised over him a great heap of stones which was called Sidh-an-Caradh, or the Friendly Hill.

In this story of Lughaidh we have allusion to two separate arts of professional Druidism; the one, that of ascertaining Fate by consultation of "oracles", that is, Soothsaying, I suppose; and the other, the production of the magical Fire, of which we have already had so many other examples in these ancient legends.

From these various instances recorded or alluded to, either in the ancient annals, on the one hand, or in ancient tales which at least preserve what men believed of the Druids, on the other, we can gather much information as to the rank and authority, and something, at least, as to the ceremonies of the Druids of ancient Erin. We have, indeed, no precise record of their specific rights, powers, or privileges; nor of the forms in which

LECT. X.

The Story of the Druid
Lughaidh
Delbaeth, or the "Fire-
producer",
the son of
Cas.

LECF. X.

No instance known, or even alluded to, of the existence of human sacrifices at any time in Erinn.

One instance, at least, recorded of human sacrifices among the Druids of Britain, (from Nennius.)

they exercised their magical arts; nor of the nature of the superstitions or religious belief which they taught. But the examples I have collected, (mere examples out of a great number of similar cases to be found in ancient MSS.), will at least prove that the historical student has a vast quantity of materials to investigate before he can pronounce with any confidence upon any of the details connected with this subject, much less theorize upon it with any safety as a whole.

It is a matter worthy of remark, that in no tale or legend of the Irish Druids which has come down to our time, is there any mention, as far as I know, of their ever having offered, or recommended to be offered, human sacrifices, either to appease or to propitiate the divine powers which they acknowledged. Not so, however, as to the British Druids, of whose acts so very few also have come down to us, voluminous as are the essays of modern "antiquaries" on their history. One reference, reliable for its antiquity at least, and well worthy of notice, is found in the Historia Britonum of Nennius, a work believed to have been written about the year 800. Of this ancient British history the oldest version now known, I believe, is the Irish translation of it made by the learned Poet and Historian, Giolla Caeimhghin, who died in the year 1072. This translation has been published, with an English translation and notes, by the Irish Archaeological Society, in the year 1848, under the able editorship of the Rev. Doctor Todd, assisted by the labours of the late learned, but sometimes very fanciful, Rev. Algernon Herbert. At page 91 of this volume, where the distress of the British king, Gortigern, pressed by the treachery of the Saxon invaders, is related, the old author speaks as follows:

"Gortigern, with his hosts and with his Druids, traversed all the south of the island of Britain, until they arrived at Guined; and they searched all the mountain of Herer, and there found a hill over the sea, and a very strong locality fit to build on, and his Druids said to him: 'Build here thy fortress', said they, 'for nothing shall ever prevail against it'. Builders were then brought thither, and they collected materials for the fortress, both stone and wood; but all these materials were carried away in one night, and materials were thus gathered thrice, and were thrice carried away. And he asked of the Druids, 'Whence is this evil?' said he. And the Druids said, 'Seek a youth whose father is unknown, kill him, and let his blood be sprinkled on the fort, for by this means only it can be built'.—The youth thus indicated proved afterwards, as we know, the celebrated philosopher Merlin, of whom so many poetical legends are current among the traditions of Celtic Britain. The Druids' recommendation was not carried into effect; and this is, I think, the only instance of ancient allusion to human sacrifice even in Britain. In Erinn, as I have already said, there appears never to have been an instance even of a proposition made to take such means of propitiating the Fates, or the Deity.

I have now, I think, given specimens of all the magical arts referred distinctly to the Druids, as such, in our old books. Whether the interpretation of dreams and of auguries drawn from the croaking of ravens, the chirping of wrens, and such like omens, (of which we find, of course, a great many instances alluded to), formed any part of the professional office of the Druid of ancient Erinn, I have not been able to ascertain. But whoever it was, or whatever class of persons, that could read such auguries, there is no doubt that they were observed, and apparently much in the manner of other ancient nations. There is indeed a small tract devoted specially to this subject, among the valuable MSS. preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, to which I may direct attention in connection with the general subject. This tract is divided into three sections, which contain the three classes of Omens I have just alluded to; that concerning Dreams and Visions, being, however, much more copious than either of the others. As it would not be possible, perhaps, to investigate the subject of the Druids and their rites without reference to whatever can be traced of the superstitious beliefs and observances of the people of their time, I cannot wholly pass by this matter in concluding what I had to say, though I shall not do more than to mention generally what it contains.

Of Divination, by Interpretation of Dreams and Omens, in ancient Erinn.

And first, as to Visions or Dreams: the list of them is in extent very copious, though the subjects are very meagrely treated; and though the connection between the several articles mentioned and the vision of the dreamer to whom they may occur does not seem very clear, it may however, perhaps, become so when all the various examples of such visions preserved in the Tales, etc., are critically considered. For the present purpose I need do no more than give a literal translation of some few of the entries or memoranda in the tract, as specimens of this interesting record. Those on dreams run as follows:

As to Dreams and Visions.

"A dead King denotes shortness of life. A King dying denotes loss. A King captured alive denotes evil. A brilliant Sun denotes blood. A dark Sun denotes danger. Two Suns in one night, disgrace. The Sun and Moon in the same course, battles. To hear Thunder denotes protection. Darkness de-

LECT. X. notes disease. To cut the Nails denotes tribulation. A golden Girdle around you denotes envy. To sow Tares denotes combats. To catch Birds by night denotes spoils by day. Birds flying from you by night denote the banishment of your enemies. To carry or to see Arms denotes honour";—and so on.

Auguries from Birds.

The divisions of the tract concerning Auguries from the Croaking of Ravens and the Chirping of Wrens, are in the same style, but more specific, because the subject is so. Some of the distinctions taken respecting the sounds made by birds are very curious, almost suggesting the recognition of some species of language among them. I should observe that both the Ravens and the Wrens, whose croaking and chirping was the subject of the augury, seem to have been domesticated birds, (probably domesticated for the very purpose of these auguries), as will be perceived at once, even in the few examples I am about to select. These, as before, shall be literally translated.

The Raven.

Of the Raven the writer says: "If the Raven croaks over a closed bed within the house, this denotes that a distinguished guest, whether lay or clerical, is coming to you. But there is a difference between them. If he be a layman that is to come, it is 'bacach! bacach!' the Raven says. But if it be a man in holy orders, it is 'gradh! gradh!' it says; and it is far in the day that it croaks. If it be a soldier or a satirist that is coming, it is 'grog! grog!' or 'grob! grob!' that it croaks; and it is behind you that it speaks, and it is from that direction the guests are to come". And again: "If it be in a small voice that the Raven speaks", says this tract, "namely, 'err! err!' or 'ur! ur!', there is sickness to come on some person in the house, or on some of its cattle. If it is wolves that are to come to the sheep, it is from the sheep-pens, or else from beside the woman of the house, that he croaks, and what he says is 'carna! carna!' 'grob! grob!' 'coin! coin!'; (that is, wolves, wolves)". And again: "If the Raven should accompany or precede you on an expedition, and that he is joyous, your journey will be prosperous. If it is to the left he goes, and croaks at you in front, it is at a coward he croaks in that manner, or his croaking denotes disgrace to some one of the party";—and so on.

The Wren.

Of the chirping of the Wren a similar list of observations is recorded, and in the same manner; but I need not give details of further specimens of this class.

Augury from the Stars and Clouds by night.

As may be imagined, the practice of Augury, or Soothsaying, was not confined to these observations, and one instance may be remembered of another class of Auguries as already described in a former lecture.<sup>(174)</sup> I mean that of the auguries taken from observation of the stars and clouds by night, by the Druids of Dathi, the last of our pagan monarchs. In that instance the divination is stated to have been conducted by the Druids by name. And I suppose it is but probable that all such Auguries as those of which I have just been speaking were generally practised by the same influential order. I have, however, (as already remarked), no positive proof that these divinations were confined to the class of Druids. Indeed, this class of learned men is not anywhere sufficiently defined to us in the old MSS., either as to their privileges, their doctrines, or their system of education; and we have, as may be observed, many instances of kings and chiefs who happened to have been also Druids, though no instance of a Druid, as such, arriving at or exercising any civil or military authority.

<sup>(174)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc. pp. 284-5.

LECT. X.

In this too short account of what is really known from authentic histories of this mysterious class or order of men, I have, as I already observed, by no means exhausted the subject; on the contrary, there are vast numbers of allusions to the Druids, and of specific instances of the exercise of their vocation,—be it magical, religious, philosophical, or educational,—to be found in our older MSS., which in a course of lectures like the present it would be quite impossible to unfold at full length. For these examples generally occur in the midst of the recital of long stories, or passages of history; and they could not be made properly intelligible without giving the context at so much length as often to lead us entirely away from the more immediate subject. And yet, considering the meagreness of facts and of any specific statements in all that has been yet published concerning the Druids of Britain and of Gaul, (who, I may observe, appear to have differed materially from those of our island in many of their most important observances), I believe I have already described so many instances of Druidism as recorded in Gaedhelic MSS. as will be found to throw a great deal of light upon the path of the investigator of this difficult and curious subject.

From the records of the earlier stages of our history instances have been adduced of the contests in druidical Spells between the Nemidians and Fomorians; of druidical Clouds raised by the Incantations of the Druidesses before the celebrated battle of Magh Tuireadh; of Showers or Fire and of Blood said to have been produced by the same agency on that occasion; of the Spells, broken, after three days, by the counter arts in magic of the Firbolg Druids; of the Healing Fountain gifted by Druidical spells, at the same battle; and of the Explanation of Recapitulation.

LECT. X.
Recapitulation.

the Dream of the Firbolg King Eochaidh Mac Erc, through the means of a Vision raised by the "prophetic ait" of his Druid Cesarn.

After this period we have, on the coming of the Milesian colony, the Tempest raised by the Druids of the Tuatha Dé Danann, when they had persuaded their invaders to take to their ships again; and the discovery of the magical nature of this tempest by that observation from the topmast of one of the vessels, which proved that it only extended a few feet above the level of the water. And I quoted from an ancient authority the very words attributed to Amergin the Druid, one of the sons of Milesius, in the druidical oration by which he allayed this magical tempest.

Passing on in the course of time we had an instance of the druidical Fire, in the story of Midhé, the son of Brath, son of Detha; and in the singular tale of Edain (Bé-finn), the queen of Eochaidh Airemh, (in the first century before Christ), an example of Druidical Incantation; of the early science of Ógam letters; and of the use of the Yew-wand, which, and not the oak, nor the mistletoe, seems to have been the sacred Druidical Tree in Erinn.

In the stories of Cuchulainn, again, we had an instance of a Trance produced by magical arts; of the mad rage of the hero, and of how, in the midst of that rage, he was caught as it were by the hands and feet, through druidical Incantations; and another kind of druidical charm instanced by the Drink of Oblivion, finally given to the hero and to Eimir, his wife.

In the account of the means taken to discover the destined successor of king Conairé Mór, we had then in some detail the description of a Vision produced by Druidical Incantations; and of the Omens of a day, an instance in those observed by Cathbadh, the Druid, on the day of the admission of Cuchulainn to the arms of knighthood; while of the general observation of the Stars and Clouds, those made by the Druids of king Dathi, before his foreign expedition, and described in a former lecture, afford a very distinct example. Of Druidical Oracles, that which I have just referred to in the story of Lughaidh Delbaeth, and Aiefé, his daughter, is a fair specimen. The singular sorcery of the "Wisp of Straw", occurring in the curious stories of Nuadha Fullon and of the prince Comgan, son of Maelochtar, is another remarkable case of Druidical ceremony, very minutely described. And in addition to this example, we had that, in full detail, of the use of the Wisp in connexion with the Druidical Fire, in the story of the Ossorian Druid Dill and queen Eithné of Cashel, so lately as the fifth century. Lastly, the very extraordinary account of the siege of Drom Damhghairé, or Knocklong, with the druidical contests of Mogh Ruith and Ciothruadh, proved even still more specific in the details of the same kind which it preserves to us. And the stories of Saint Patrick's contests with the Druids again afforded instances of Druidical Darkness magically produced, even in his time.

LECT. X.

Closely connected with the druidical rites and belief were the systems of poetical divination, such as the Imbas Forosnai, and the Teinm Laeghdha, prohibited by Saint Patrick, as connected with idol worship; and this species of Druidism we found practised by the famous Finn MacCumhaill in the third century. Another curious instance of it was preserved in that story of the recognition of the skull of Mogh Eimhé, the lap-dog, two centuries after its death, by the poet Maen Mac Etnae. Lastly, of the effects of the poetical satires I gave some further instances, as they were evidently the remains of the more ancient magical usages.

It is unfortunate that we have no certain account of the Religion of the time of the Druids. We only know that they worshipped idols, from such examples as that of the Idol Gods taken into the Druid's bed, so as to influence his visions, as described in Cormac's Glossary, and that of the invocation of idols in the case of the Teinm Laeghdha; and we know that in certain ceremonies they made use of the Yew tree, of the Quicken or Roan tree, and of the Black-Thorn, as in the instance of the ordeal or test of a woman's character by means of fire made of these sacred woods. That the people of ancient Erin were idolaters is certain, for they certainly adored the great idol called Crom Cruach, in the plain called Magh Slecht, as I showed on a former occasion.<sup>(175)</sup> But it is remarkable that we find no mention of any connexion between this Idol and the Druids, or any other Class of Priests, or special Idol-servers. We have only record of the people, generally, assembling at times, to do honour to the Idol creation.

As to the Religion, and the Organization of the Druids.

As little, unfortunately, do we know of the organization of the Order of the Druids, if they were indeed an Order. They certainly were not connected as such with the orders of learned men or Profession of Teachers, such as before explained. The Druids were often, however, engaged in teaching, as has been seen; and it would appear that kings and chiefs, as well as learned men, were also frequently Druids, though how or why I am not in a position to explain with certainty at present.

<sup>(175)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, &c. p. 103; and APP. pp. 538, 631-2.

LECT. X.

I have, therefore, simply endeavoured to bring together such a number of examples as may give some general idea of the position and powers of the Druids, so far as special instances are preserved in our early writings, of their mode of action and position in society. And I have refrained from suggesting any theory of my own upon the subject. This negative conclusion, nevertheless, I will venture to draw from the whole: that notwithstanding the singularly positive assertions of many of our own as well as of English writers upon the subject, there is no ground whatever for believing the Druids to have been the priests of any special positive worship,—none whatever for imputing to them human sacrifices,—none whatever for believing that the early people of Erin adored the sun, moon, or stars,—nor that they worshipped fire;—and still less foundation for the ridiculous inventions of modern times, (inventions of pure ignorance), concerning honours paid to Brown Bulls, Red Cows, or any other cows, or any of the lower animals.

There are in our MSS., as I have already observed, a great number of instances of Druidism mentioned besides those I have selected. I have merely taken a specimen of each class of druidical rites recorded. I only hope I have so dealt with the subject as to assist the student, at all events, in attaining some general idea of our ancient life in respect of the superstitious observances of the people, though I cannot satisfactorily specify the forms and doctrines of our ancient system of paganism.

There are some curious allusions to an educational connexion with Asiatic Magi, in some of the stories of the very early Gaedhelic Champions, many of whom seem to have travelled by the north of Europe to the Black Sea, and across into Asia. But these will, perhaps, more properly come under our consideration in connexion with the subject of Military Education, and especially that of the professed Champions.

LECTURE XI.

[Delivered 1st June, 1858.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE. Scope of the present lectures. The earliest positive descriptions of Weapons, in Irish History. The first settlers. The colony of Parthalon. The colony of Nemidh. The Tuatha Dé Danann and Firbolg colonies. The first battle of Magh Tuireadh; (B.C. 1272). Of the arms of Sreng, the champion of the Firbolgs. The Craisech; or "thick-handled spear". Hurling-match between the armies of the Tuatha Dé Danann and the Firbolgs. Of the construction of the arms used at the Battle of Magh Tuireadh. The Manáis; or "trowel"-shaped spear. The Fiarlann; or "curved blade". Difference between the arms of the early Tuatha Dé Danann and Firbolgs. Of the arms of the Firbolgs;—the Craisech;—the Fiarlann. Different shapes of ancient Sword-blades. The Iron-mounted Club, or Mace, of the Firbolgs, (the Long-Iarainn.) Of the arms of the Tuatha Dé Danann; (Tale of the Battle of Magh Tuireadh na b-Fomhórach.) The Spear of the Tuatha Dé Danann. Of Nvadhu of the Silver Arm. Of the Three great Artificers of the Tuatha Dé Danann. Of the Forge of Goibniu.

IN the preceding lectures we have disposed of the more important general subjects connected with the present inquiry, in their legitimate order, in relation to the Civilization of the people,—the system of Legislation in ancient Erin,—the division of society into Classes,—the system of Education,—and the system of religion, if Druidism is to be so considered. I have not allowed myself to theorize upon any of them. I have strictly confined myself to an inquiry as to what is to be gathered on each of these subjects from the histories and literature which have come down to us in the ancient language, and the authorities recognized by the earliest writers and teachers of the country. I only regret that it was impossible for me, within the necessary limits of such a course as the present, to do more than merely present the results of my examination of those authorities, together with some examples of each of them selected from a great store which has yet to be searched out completely before a full history of the Civilization of ancient Erin can be properly undertaken. We come now to another class of subjects in the consideration of details equally important in connexion with the yet undeveloped study of our early history, and in themselves, perhaps, likely to prove even more generally interesting than the contents of the preceding lectures.

LECT. XI.

Of Weapons of Warfare.Scope of the present lectures.

The first class of these details forms the necessary preliminary to the subject of the Military Institutions of the country; that, namely, which embraces the Description and Classification of the various WEAPONS OF WARFARE, offensive and defensive, known in ancient Erinn. And the interest which I hope every student will find in forming some acquaintance with these weapons cannot fail to be increased by the opportunities which every one in this city possesses of visiting the museum of the Royal Irish Academy in which is preserved so great an abundance of specimens of almost all the various arms which I shall have occasion to mention, including even those of the very earliest ages of our history.

To trace the history of a people's progress in the arts of civilized life, through a long series of generations, from the first settling down in some temporary hut on the brink of a river or on the skirts of a forest of one or more poor families, ignorant of the proper implements for the cultivation of the soil, the fishing of the rivers, the clearing of the forest, the housing and clothing of themselves,—the history of the gradual progress of a people from so helpless a beginning, to its eventual developement in a populous and prosperous nation not only possessing an excellent system of agriculture, but skilled in all domestic and ornamental manufactures (including that of the finest weapons of military warfare), enterprising in commerce, and happy in free institutions, good laws, and a vigorous national government,—such a history, (if the history of Ireland could be so described), would be, indeed, a subject highly worthy of the study of the philosopher, and of the indefatigable labours of the antiquarian and historical student. It is well that I have not to deal with such a history, or the task would be but poorly performed. As it is, it is not without great diffidence that I venture to approach the examination of even a section of our primitive history, conscious as I am of my inadequacy to do anything like justice to a subject now so difficult and obscure, and one which has already engaged the attention of so many scholars and investigators, both at home and abroad. And this diffidence is increased by the consciousness that the conclusions I have arrived at, after the most mature consideration, are often totally at variance with the opinions of many of the writers I allude to.

It does not come within the scope of my lectures to discuss the various ethnological hypotheses which from time to time have been proposed regarding the origin, or condition of the earliest inhabitants of Europe or of Erinn. The course I have strictly prescribed to myself is simply to set down the results of such positive information as I have been able to collect from our own early authorities, taken in connexion with the positive remains of genuine ancient workmanship preserved in our museums and elsewhere. I shall thus distinctly state all the foundations for my own conclusions, and I shall leave it to others to examine the value of these for themselves; fully trusting that when the authorities and remains to which I shall refer shall be investigated as they deserve, the truth will at last come out in its proper colours. Nor is the subject interesting to us alone; for it has a direct bearing upon similar investigations in the history and antiquities of other nations also, and in particular of France, of Northern Germany, of Denmark, and of Norway, as well as of Great Britain; so that I would earnestly claim the assistance also of all sincere students of early history in these different countries, for their own sake as well as ours. When each produces the evidence which his own language can afford of the state of civilization in arts and manufactures during the first ages, then and not until then historians will really be able to sift and compare the scraps of knowledge so preserved, and really to undertake the true solution of these interesting questions of archaeology.

Whether our remote colonists brought with them military teachers, or at what time, if ever, Military Schools were first established in Erin, it would be vain to pretend to lay down, with any degree of certainty, or upon any reliable authority; but upon this part of my subject I shall have something to say on a future occasion. All that I propose to do at present is to give, from ancient Irish writings, as many references as may seem necessary to explain what was known or believed many centuries ago, relative to the use, material, and manufacture of the Military Weapons of ancient Erin, and the times and the people to which such references belong, according to our native books of history, chronology, and genealogies. And in order to do this in something of a regular order, I believe it will be convenient in as brief a manner as possible to refer chronologically to the unanimous ancient accounts of our early colonists, and of the countries from which they are stated to have come, introducing what is said of the various weapons and their uses just as they occur in the accounts of the successive contests here recorded.

The earliest positive description of the forms and nature of the weapons used by the primitive races in Erin, is found in the tracts concerning the two battles of Magh Tuireadh, of which I had occasion to speak at some length on a former occasion; the first of these battles having been fought between the Firbolgs and the Tuatha Dé Danann, (two races long anterior to the Milesian Gaedhils in the occupation of the country); and

LECT. XI.

Earliest positive description of Weapons in Irish history.

LECT. XI. the second between the latter people and the northern sea rovers, known in our history as the Fomorians. But the early annalists and ancient historians make very positive record of the existence in the island of more than one tribe long before even these, in the successive march of the waves of population towards the west from the cradle of the human race in western Asia. And these early tribes also had arms and implements, of which they appear to have made active use.

Traces of a colonization before that of Parthalon.

Even before the coming of Parthalon,—call him too but a legendary character if you will,—mention is made in very ancient story of a previous colonization, under the guidance of a chief sprung from the ruler of "Sliabh Ughmoir", which was the ancient Gaedhelic name for the Caucasus. This people is said to have lived here for some generations, until they were defeated and almost extirpated by the followers of Parthalon at a battle fought by him, on his landing, in the plain of Magh Ita, in Ulster. Perhaps the statement of the existence of this first colony may be more satisfactory to the advocates of the theory of primitive barbarism, when I add that they are said to have lived only by fishing and fowling. The legendary account of them is extravagant enough; but so much, at least, may certainly be gathered from it with some degree of certainty.

Parthalon's
Colony.

After this most ancient colony, the next historical or legendary tribe that appears on the scene is that of Parthalon, whose genealogy is minutely given by the old historians, and who is said to have landed in Erin so long ago as in the eighth generation after the general deluge. He is explicitly recorded to have come from "Migdonia", or Middle Greece; and to have landed, with about a thousand families, at Inis Saimer, a small island in the River Erne, near Ballyshannon, in the present county of Donegal. No detailed accounts of Parthalon's exploits is to be found; but he is stated to have fought not only the battle in which he subdued the tribe which had settled in Erin before him, but two great battles with different parties of the Fomorians or northern Sea-Rovers, in which he was victorious. The arms used on these occasions are not, however, mentioned. But that his people were provided with implements of peace, as well as warlike arms, and were so far civilized as to be acquainted with the practice of agriculture, is proved by the record which states that it was by that people that the plains called Magh Eithrighé in Connacht, Magh Ita in Ulster, Magh Lir in Meath, and Magh Lathairné in Dal Araidhé in Ulster, were cleared from forest and brought into cultivation. And he is distinctly stated to have possessed oxen, and ploughmen, (which, I presume, implies also ploughs).

The colony of Parthalon is recorded to have been almost entirely cut off by a plague or mortality which destroyed about nine thousand of this people, in the plain of the Lifé, or Lifley, about three hundred years after the first landing of the tribe in Erin. And the early histories note that the remains of this people are marked by those very mounds which still exist on the hill of Tamhlacht, or Tallacht, in this county; a place, indeed, whose very name is derived from this account, being called in the Gaedhelic Taimh-Leachta Muinntiré Phartalaín; or, literally, The Mortality-Tombs of the People of Parthalon; a name by which it has been known from the earliest ages.

After Parthalon yet another wave of population reached our shores, before the coming of the Firbolgs and the Tuatha Dé Danann; a people, indeed, who were said to have been not only the predecessors but the actual progenitors of both these tribes. These were the "Nemidians", or followers of Nemidh, a chieftain of the same Japhetic race, who is said to have come out of "Scythia" into Erin, with about a thousand followers, some thirty years after the Partholanian mortality. This nation seems also to have been comparatively civilized; for it is recorded in all the ancient books that these Nemidians built two royal Rathes or Courts in Erin;—one called Raith Cinneich, in the territory of Uibh Niallain, (now the barony of Hy-Nelland, in the county of Armagh); and the other called Raith Cimbaeth, in Leinnac, (on the east coast of the present county of Antrim). And under them, too, the improvements begun by Parthalon were immediately resumed; for Nemidh's people are said to have cleared twelve great plains, from the forest, in different parts of the Island. The Nemidians also fought several fierce battles against the Fomorians or Sea Rovers of the time; but no account has come down to us supplying any details regarding their military weapons, any more than the agricultural and other domestic implements used by them. This colony is recorded to have held the country for more than two hundred years, until they had at last become so enfeebled by the frequent descents of the Fomorians, (particularly after the great battle of Torry Island, on the north-west coast of the present county of Donegal, in which they suffered most severely), that their leading men fled out of the island, leaving behind them but a few defenceless families. Of the fugitives one party is said to have taken refuge in Britain; and another to have made its way into Thrace; while a third passed into the north of Europe, and is reported by some writers to have settled in Bœotia. The party which passed into Thrace are recorded to have been the ancestors of the Firbolgs; and that which passed into the north of Europe the ancestors of the

LECT. XI.

The Nemidian Colony.

LECT. XI

Tuatha Dé Danann. The Firbolgs are said to have returned in about two hundred years after the flight of the Nemidians, and the Tuatha Dé Danann thirty-seven years later: and this last date is placed by the Four Masters about eighteen hundred years before Christ.

The Tuatha Dé Danann and Firbolg Colonies.

There seems to have been no intercourse between these two great branches of the early colonists of Erin during all the two centuries and a half which elapsed since their common ancestors had abandoned the island. During that period it would seem that the branch since known as the Tuatha Dé Danann had in their residence in the north of Europe attained a much superior degree of civilization to that of the Firbolgs, who lived in Greece, according to the national traditions, in a state of mere slavery for the greater part of this time. Certain it is that all the very early traditions respecting the Tuatha Dé Danann indicate that they were a people possessed of an amount of mechanical skill and philosophical knowledge, as well as of a degree of general refinement, so much greater than that not only of the Firbolgs whom they subjugated, but even of the subsequent Milesian immigration by which in their turn they were themselves subdued, that for ages afterwards they were currently believed by their less-educated successors, and enslaved or obscure descendants, to have been gifted with supernatural powers.

The Tuatha Dé Danann.

It is much to be deplored that so few historic vestiges remain to testify the very remote civilization of this ancient people. Unfortunately the Annalists and Historians whose works have, in the whole or in part, come down to us are of the conquering Milesian race alone; and the notices they give of their conquered predecessors are very slender. Perhaps indeed the investigation of those very arms, of which I am now about to report the very little that is known, will be found to embrace almost all that can with certainty be gleaned from our records concerning them. For it is in the account of the two great battles in which, immediately after their arrival, they established themselves in sovereignty, against the Firbolgs on the one side, and the northern sea rovers on the other, that we find almost all the particulars known to Irish history of the Tuatha Dé Danann: and it is in the details of this account also that the only minute description of the various ancient arms is preserved.

On a former occasion I described at length the recorded account of the two battles of Magh Tuireadh,<sup>(176)</sup> and I need do no more now than shortly refer to them before I extract from these ancient histories what specially relates to the arms used on the occasion.

(176) See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., pp. 244, 247, etc.

The first Battle of Magh Tuireadh was fought between the Firbolgs and the Tuatha Dé Danann, shortly after the former discovered that like themselves the latter people had also returned into Erin to take possession of the ancient inheritance of their common ancestors. Its date is fixed, according to O'Flaherty's chronology, A.M. 2737, or B.C. 1272; and according to the chronology followed by the Four Masters, A.M. 3303, or B.C. 1890.

LECT. XI

The First Battle of Magh Tuireadh.

The Firbolgs had settled their seat of sovereignty at Tara, where they lived under the government of a distinguished warrior, king Eochaidh Mac Erc, when they heard of the appearance of their rivals, who had entered the island on the north-west and had established themselves in the strongholds of the present county of Leitrim. The Firbolgs, on consultation, determined to send a picked champion of their force to enter into communication with the strangers, and to ascertain what their intentions were; and their choice fell upon Sreng, the son of Sengann; and it is in the description of the meeting of this warrior with Breas, the equally redoubted champion messenger of the Tuatha Dé Danann, that the first description of the weapons on both sides, both offensive and defensive, is found. Without occupying any unnecessary space, then, in detailing the description of the battle itself, I shall proceed to refer to those passages only which contain any description of the shape, size, construction, and use of the various arms employed; and I shall afterwards endeavour to classify these, as well as I can, with reference to the collection of specimens open for examination in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy.

Upon the selection of Sreng by the council of the Firbolgs: Arms of Sreng.
 "he arose then", says the ancient writer, "and took his hooked, firm, brown-red shield; and his two thick-handled spears, called Craisechs; and his keen-gliding sword; and his elegant quadrangular [square?] helmet; and his thick iron club; and he set out from Tara",—etc. And when Sreng arrived in sight of the camp of the Tuatha Dé Danann, Breas, the champion of the latter, came out to meet and speak with him,—“with his shield upon him”, proceeds the history, “and his sword in his hand, and having two huge spears with him”.

Champion of the Firbolgs,
(B.C. 1272.)

The two champions, we are told, wondered each at the peculiar arms of the other, their form and character being different; and when they came within speaking distance, each of them, it is said, “stuck his shield firmly into the ground”, to cover his body, while he looked over the top of it to examine his opponent. On conversation they agree to raise and put away their shields; and Sreng observes that he had raised his in dread of the "thin sharp spear" of his adversary; while Breas expresses similar respect for the "thick-handled spears" of the Firbolgs, and asks if all their arms are like them. Then to give Breas an opportunity of examining them, Sreng "took the tieings off his two thick-handled Craisechs" (or heavy spears), and asks Breas what he thinks of them; who replies in surprise and admiration of the "great, pointless, heavy, thick, sharp-edged arms", and refers to the sharpness of their touch, their power when cast at an enemy, the wounds that would come of rubbing to their edge, and the deadliness of their thrust; thus describing both the form and modes of use of this peculiar kind of spear. Sreng then explains that the name of the weapon is Craisech; that they are "gorers of flesh", and "crushers of bones", and "breakers of shields", and that their thrust or stroke is death, or perpetual mutilation. On separating they exchange weapons, we are told, that the hosts on each side might thus form an opinion of the other, by examination of a specimen of the arms. Breas gives Sreng his two Sleghs or spears, and sends word by him that the Tuatha Dé Danann will insist on half of the island; that they would take so much in peace, but if so much were not conceded by the Firbolgs they must try the issue of a battle between them. Sreng then returns to the Firbolg camp, and it is in his account of the champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann that we have a description of their weapons. "Their shields", he says, "are great and firm; their spears are sharp, thin, and hard; their swords are hard and deep-edged". And Sreng recommended his people accordingly to agree to the proposed terms, and to divide the country equally with the strangers. This, however, they would not consent to do, for they said if they gave the Tuatha Dé Danann half, they would soon take the whole.

L.FCT. XI.

The Craisech.

On the other side, the Tuatha Dé Danann were so much impressed with the report of Breas, and with the appearance of the terrible Craisechs, that they resolved to secure themselves by taking up a better military position before the impending battle, and they retired, accordingly, farther west into Connacht, where they fixed their camp in the plain of Magh Nia, (close to the present church and village of Cong, in the modern county of Mayo); and at the west-end of this plain they entrenched themselves, we are told, so as to have the fastnesses of the great mountain, Belgatan, in their rear, through which their retreat could be safely made, if necessary.

The Firbolgs, (continues the story,) subsequently assembled their levies and encamped "in eleven battalions", at the east end of the same plain. Then Nuadha, the king of the Tuatha

Dé Danann, (the celebrated Nuadha "of the silver hand"), LECT. XI. sent envoys to make the same proposition formerly made through Breus. King Eochaidh Mac Erc referred them for an answer to his nobles present, and these at once declared that they would not consent. The Poets, (that is, the envoys), asked in reply when then did they propose to give battle; and the Fírbolgs made the very remarkable answer, that "delay is necessary, for", said they, "we require time to put in order our spears, to repair our armour, to burnish our helmets, and to sharpen our swords, and to make proper preparation for battle; and we require too", said they, "to have spears like yours made for us, and ye require to have Craisechs like ours made for you".
So they agreed on a delay of 105 days for preparation.

From this passage it would appear that the Fírbolgs had no other spears but the Craisechs, which were "pointless". However, the writer of this history observes that the Fírbolgs must have had pointed spears too, (or at least must have been acquainted with them); because, he says, the weapon had been introduced among them by their former king, Rinnal, the grandfather of king Eochaidh. And that this was the common belief of other ancient writers, is evidenced by an ancient tract on the etymology of proper names (called Coir Anmann), of which copies are preserved in the books of Leinster, Lecain, and Ballymote, from which the following stanzas are quoted from a poem on the reign of the Fírbolg kings, written by Tanaidhí O'Maelchonairé [O'Mulconry], (who died A. D. 1136): Pointed Spears known also to the Fírbolgs.

"Until Rinnal arose, there were no points

To arms, at first, in Erin:

Rude spears without smooth handles,

And they only like forest-axes". * * *

"The brave Tuatha Dé Danann brought Pointed spears in their hands with them.

Of these was killed king Eochaidh,

By the victorious race of Nemid.<sup>(177)</sup>

The day of battle came at last; the first day of the sixth week of summer. The battle proceedings were opened by a sort of match or game of hurl, in which the three times nine hurlers on the side of the Tuatha Dé Danann were not only defeated but Hurling Match between the Tuatha Dé
Danann and the Fírbolgs,
(A.C. 1272.)

(177) original:—Sua far Rinnal ní b'oi pinn for arm an túr in Eirinn fongaib gansa gan cleit cam ra mbeir map prócpannaib.
Tucraí tuath de Danann oil laighe leó na lámaib, oibreim nó mapbaí coctáir
la píle Nemro neptreptaig.

LXCT. XI.

themselves slain by the Firbolg party. A messenger was then sent by king Eochaidh to the camp of the Tuatha Dé Danann, (such was the chivalrous custom, it seems, of those days), to arrange how the contest should be carried on, and whether it should be every day or only every second day. And it was agreed, on the demand of the Tuatha Dé Danann, that it should be fought always with equal numbers; an arrangement very disagreeable, says the writer, to the Firbolg king, because he had largely the advantage in the numbers of his army. The battle then commenced, and the description of it is that of a number of successive feats of gallantry, now on one side, now on the other, conceived much in the manner in which such a contest would have appeared to the author of the Iliad. Physicians, also, on both sides, are said to have had healing baths, made with medicinal herbs and plants, into which the survivors of each day were put, so as to be healed and strengthened for next morning's engagement.

Allusions to
the construction of Arms in the Tale of the Battle of Mágh Tuireadh.

The description of the various single combats by which such a struggle was naturally distinguished offers occasional hints not only of the use but of the construction of the weapons. Thus, in the passage which relates the combat between the champion Aidleo and the Firbolg warrior Nertchu, it is stated that: "their firmly-clutched shields were torn from their fists, their swords broken at their hilts, and their spears wrenched from their rivets",—an expression which at once distinguishes that kind of spear in which the blade was received into the handle, as we shall afterwards see.

The Mandis.

Again, when the advance of the two kings, and the array of the select bands led by each, is described, the line of Firbolg warriors is said to have appeared: "sparkling, brilliant, and flaming, with their swords, spears, blades, and trowel-spears", (mandis, a different weapon from any yet mentioned) flashing in the sun; while that of the Tuatha Dé Danann is also called a flaming line, "under their red-bordered, speckled, and firm shields". And in the shock of battle both are said to have fought with sharp spears, till the thick spear-handles were twisted out of their hands, and the swords broken upon what are described as "the polished surfaces of the curved shields". So, also, mention is made of the havoc caused by their "curved blades"; and the reverberating "strokes" of the craisech are spoken of as tearing and splitting the shields of the warriors. So, also, the weary combatants stopping to take breath are described as springing up again to the upper edges of their shields, to attempt "blows of decapitation" upon the exposed necks of each other; and they are described as "raising their powerful arms on high to shower down crushing blows of the sword upon each other's helmets, so as to break or cleave them". And the blow by which king Nuadha lost that right arm which is said to have been afterwards replaced by an artificial one of silver, was the blow of the sword of the champion Sreng, which is stated to have not only severed the arm at the shoulder, but to have carried with it to the ground a third part of the monarch's shield. And when Sreng is then pressed on by Aengabha of Iruaidh, and a crowd of the Tuatha Dé Danann, in assistance of their king, the exact nature of the Craisech is well indicated in the description of his thrusts, which are said to have been more powerful because of the "sharp breadth of his spear, and the thickness of its handle". LECT. XI.

Craisech.

The subsequent combat, again, between king Eochaidh Mac Ere and Breas, the great champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann, (in which Breas is eventually killed), is commenced by the clashing together of the shields of the two warriors. And the use of the "curved blade" is indicated in the passage immediately following, where the four brothers of Breas, springing forward to his rescue, are met by the four sons of Slaingé. Both parties begin by striking fiercely at each other's shields, but it is observed (and it is this I wish to lay some stress on) that not only did their bodies suffer from the blows of the swords, but in the ardour of their fight "the hair of the champions was cut off behind" by their "curved blades". The "curved blade";
Fiarlann.

The event of the battle at last (according to the tale) was unfavourable to the Firbolgs, who, before resolving to abandon the island altogether, made one final attempt to recover their ground, by challenging their opponents to risk the issue of the war on a fight between three hundred men on each side. But the Tuatha Dé Danann, themselves exhausted, proposed in return that there should be no more fighting, but that the Firbolgs should be accorded one province of Erinn at their own option, the remainder being reserved to their hardly victorious rivals, and that both parties should in future live in peace with one another. And this offer the Firbolgs gladly accepted, choosing for themselves the province of Connacht, in which both parties then were; (and so Duald Mac Fírbis mentions, in his great Book of Genealogies, finished in 1650, that some of their descendants were still known in Connacht, even down to that day).

If there be any credence due to our ancient histories and Historic Tales,<sup>(178)</sup> I think it will be admitted that the account

(178) See as to the authority of the "Historic Tales", Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., pp. 239-241.

LECT. XI

Differences between the arms of the early Tuatha
Dé Danann
and Firbolgs.

The arms of the Firbolgs.
The Cra-sech.

of the famous battle of Magh Tuireadh, to which I have so copiously referred, is fully sufficient to prove that even our earliest population possessed no small knowledge of metals.

It is to be observed that in this ancient account of the battle of Magh Tuireadh the arms of the Firbolgs are distinctly described as "broad", "heavy", "sharp", and "pointless"; and that they are said to have consisted of a Craisech, a Fiarlann, a Claidheamh and a Long-Iarainn; while the arms of the Tuatha Dé Danann are distinguished as "pointed", and are said to have consisted of a Sleigh, a Goth-Mhanais, and a Claidheamh. It would be impossible satisfactorily to describe these different weapons in mere words, so as to distinguish properly their various shapes and features; and it has occurred to me that it would be very desirable to make my hearers acquainted with their appearance by a more direct representation. This I am happy to be able to do, through the kindness of the curator of the museum of the Royal Irish Academy, who has permitted me to make use of some most accurate drawings, of the full size, of such of the weapons to which I have alluded as I have been able, so far as my judgment goes, to identify among the arms preserved in the museum of the Academy.<sup>(179)</sup>

The first is the Firbolg Craisech. It was, according to its description in the ancient account of the battle, a broad and thick weapon, sharp-edged, and rounded at the top; and (judging by the specimen) it was made of fine bronze, and finished with much skill. It must have been received into the end of the pole or handle, and fastened by those five rivets (preserved in the specimen),<sup>(180)</sup> which passed through the wood socket and blade, and were flattened down at both sides of the handle. The handle must have been thick and heavy at the point of receiving the blade, for such it is described in the account of the battle, where these weapons are invariably

[<sup>(179)</sup> As to the Catalogue by Sir W. R. Wilde, published by the Royal Irish Academy, see INTRODUCTION, ante. Professor O'Curry disagreed with most of the guesses of Sir W. Wilde as to the uses and as to the date of the implements and ornaments of early ages referred to in that publication. The engravings in it are, however, accurate.]

[<sup>(180)</sup> The specimen referred to by Professor O'Curry is not engraved in the Academy Catalogue. Figures 1, 2, 3, (see INTRODUCTION), however, which are erroneously supposed by Sir W. Wilde to represent the blades of battle-axes (see Catalogue, p. 489), though smaller in size, will furnish almost equally good examples of this weapon. The blade of fig. 1 (fig. 856, No. 256, Cat. R.I.A.) is 3½ inches long (the whole bronze is 5½ inches), and 3¼ inches wide. Fig. 2 (fig. 357, No. 269), which is drawn one-fourth of the original in size, is 9 inches long, and 3½ broad. Another Craisech is that figured in Sir W. Wilde's catalogue as a sword (No. 232, Fig. 327), which is 12½ inches long, 2½ inches broad at the bottom, and 1½ inches within an inch of the end.—See Fig. 3.]

called "Craisecha crannremra Catha", that is, "thick-handed battle Craisechs". LECT. XI.

The shaft was probably flattened thin, and mounted with a thick plate or ferule of bronze, on which the rivets were flattened at both sides; else the wood would have been in danger of splitting. Indeed an instance of this actually occurs in the combat between Aidleo, the son of Allai, of the Tuatha Dé Danann, and Nertchu, the grandson of Semeon, of the Firbolgs, where the writer says: "Their shields were wrested from their firm grasp, their swords were broken at the hilts, and their spears were wrenched from their rivets"<sup>(181)</sup> And although such rings or ferules as I have been speaking of are not mentioned in this tract, there is frequent mention made of them in other ancient tracts, into which they are introduced under the names of sethdán, or flat rings, both for ornament and use, as shall be shown at another place.

Ferules or Rings for Spear-
Rivets. (Fethdán).

It does not appear distinctly from the authority from which I have been quoting that the spears of the Tuatha Dé Danann were mounted in a way different from those of the Firbolgs; on the contrary, the only difference spoken of between them, in any way, is that the former were "sharp-pointed", whilst the latter were "rounded at the top". Still, however, the shape must have been, and, in fact, was different; because all the spears with sockets ever discovered, (and there are great numbers of both kinds in our various collections,) are pointed; while the Craisechs and the Fíarlanna which were received into the handle are rounded at the top. There is, indeed, another class, (of which very early specimens are to be found in the Museum of the Academy), which embraces the supposed characteristics of both; being sharply pointed after the Tuatha Dé Danann fashion, and having been received into the handle, after that of the Firbolgs.<sup>(182)</sup> It could not, however, have belonged to them, according to the distinction laid down in this tract, unless, indeed, it be an exceptional weapon, for which we have, as already mentioned, some authority in old writings;—and among others, in what is stated in O'Maelchonairé's poem, that Rinnal, the grandfather of the Firbolg king Eochaidh Mac Erc, had in his own time introduced sharp-pointed spears among his people. It is certain from the tract, however, that such a form was, at least, not generally adopted or preserved among them. Be this as it may, there is a weapon among the oldest in the

Mounting of the Spear-points
among the
*Tuatha Dé
Danann* and
the Firbolgs.

<sup>(181)</sup> original:—Ro rrengait a rceat ar a n-glaetaib comolúta, no cláit a clóime in mormadaib a n-uioon, no ruit a rleaga na remannaib.

<sup>(182)</sup> The specimen Fig. 4. (fig. 340, No. 156, Acad. Catal.) is a bronze spear-head, 10 inches long, and half an inch wide at the middle of the blade.

LXCT. XI.

The Fiarlann,
of the
Firbolgs.

Academy, certainly as old as any that we are acquainted with, bearing the recorded characteristics of both nations, and yet not positively referable to either in particular, as far as I can decide; but the blade and mounting are more of the Firbolg type.

In the Academy collection we have next a specimen of the Firbolg Fiarlann, or "curved blade", which, like the craisech, was received into the end of the pole or handle, and fastened by rivets.<sup>(183)</sup> It is clear from the curvature in the line of this beautiful double-edged blade, that it was not intended to be cast from the hand like the craisech, (which was cast as well as used in striking), or like the ordinary spear, or sleigh; but that it was used only for striking and thrusting at close quarters.

We are told in the Tale of the battle of Magh Tuireadh that king Nuadha had his arm cut off from the shoulder by a blow of the sword of Sreng, the Firbolg champion; and certainly there is no weapon among those assigned to either party which would appear so capable of performing such a deed as this fiarlann, or "curved blade".

The Fiarlanna, or "curved blades", are twice mentioned in the battle of Magh Tuireadh, in the fight of the fourth day; where it is first said that they were cooled or tempered in the boiling blood of the noble warriors;—and again, in the combat between the four brothers of the Daghda, the great chief of the Tuatha Dé Danann, and the four sons of Slainné of the Firbolg party; where it is stated that the combat was firmly maintained by them with their swords, and that their hair was cut off behind by the sharp edges of the Fiarlanna. In this combat there is no allusion to craisechs or spears, but only to swords and fiarlanna; which may perhaps be considered to show that the latter weapon was used in close fight only, or chiefly.

The Fiarlann, or "curved blade", from its great width in the shank, would require, one should think, a very thick clumsy handle, and so it surely would if the handle were merely of wood; but very fortunately we are in a position to show, by an existing example of the highest interest as well as antiquity, that the superior skill and taste of the manufacturer fitted this curious blade to a handle the most perfect for use, and the most graceful of form. My talented friend, Mr. George V. du Noyer, having visited Rouen in the summer of last year, (1857), discovered in the museum of antiquities of that city several ancient weapons, of which he made the beautiful coloured drawings presented by him to the museum of the Royal Irish Academy. It requires not, I think, a word from me to show that our own fiarlann, or "curved blade", with its three and sometimes five short rivets, was mounted in a metal handle exactly like the beautiful specimens<sup>(184)</sup> there figured of the colg, or straight blade; and it is not unimportant to remember that the country in which these colgs have been found closely adjoins that of the Belgæ, who are said to be the same race as our own Firbolgs.

(183) Fig. 5, (fig 329, No. 240 Acad. Catal.) is 16 inches long,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches broad at the bottom, and  $2\frac{1}{4}$  inches at the middle of the blade. Fig. 6, (fig. 330, No. 271, which is drawn on a larger scale) was, when perfect, about 15 inches long, and is  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches broad at bottom, and  $1\frac{1}{2}$  across the middle.

In examining the collection of Sword-Blades in the Academy, if we strictly apply to this weapon the test which applies to the craisech and fiarlann,—that is, that the rounded top is the mark of all Firbolg weapons, as distinguished from the pointed weapons of the Tuatha Dé Danann,—we can scarcely think that any precise specimen of the Firbolg sword has come to our time. Among them will be found some two or three types of ancient swords of the flagger-leaf shape; that is, widening gradually from near the hilt to about two-thirds of their length, and then narrowing gradually but more suddenly, until they terminate in a decidedly sharp point. Among them, however, will be found some which, although not decidedly rounded at the top, yet can scarcely be believed to have ever terminated in a fine sharp point. And although there are doubtless some with sharp points among them, still they are not of the flagger-leaf shape, nor have they, on close examination, much in common with that shape at all. Their solidity is great, and they are marked from hilt to top by two well defined raised lines, running along the shoulders of the blade, breaking the bevel of the edge, and marking themselves with precision the line from which the edge is to start.<sup>(185)</sup> In a second form of sharp-pointed sword it will be perceived<sup>(186)</sup> that solidity is given by a single sharp bevelled line, or ridge, running through the centre from hilt to top, and agreeing with the general character of what we shall have occasion hereafter to designate as the spear of the Tuatha Dé Danaan. Now if this slightly round-topped sword to which I have alluded cannot be brought within the range of the Firbolg peculiarity of round-topped weapons, one of two things must of necessity be supposed: either on the one hand that this pecu-

Different shapes of ancient Sword-
blades.

(184) [See Fig. 7.]

(185) The construction alluded to is represented in all but the rounded top in figs. 8, 9, 10. These figures are drawn one-sixth the size of the originals. Fig. 8, (fig. 316, No. 45, Cat. R.I.A.), is 18½ inches long by 1 inch broad at the broadest part. Fig. 9, (fig. 318, No. 5, Cat. R.I.A.), is 23½ inches long (including the hilt, 4½ inches), and 1½ broad at the centre. Fig. 10, (fig. 321, No. 40, Cat. R.I.A.), is 29½ inches long (including hilt, 2½ inches); and 1½ broad.

(186) See Fig. 11, (fig. 317, Cat. R.I.A.).

I. ECT. XI.

liarity did not extend to the sword; or, if it did, that no sword of that type has come down to our time, as none such is to be found in the collection of the Royal Irish Academy, nor is known (to me at least) to exist anywhere else.

The Iron-mounted Club (or Mace) of the Firbolgs; (Long Iarainn.)

The next of the Firbolg weapons would be the iron-mounted Club or Mace, which it is stated was carried by the warrior Sreng along with his two craisechs and his Sword, in his first interview with Breas, the champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann, but which is not further spoken of in the battle. Of the precise character of this club, however, we are at present unable to give any account, as no such weapon is now known to exist; but it was probably similar to that recorded to have been used by the Assyrian contingent in the great army of Xerxes, who are described as having been armed with brass helmets, spears, daggers, and "large clubs pointed with iron". What a club pointed with iron may have been I cannot clearly understand, unless it is meant that the head of the club was mounted with a spiked ring or head, like the mediæval Mace; and if that were the case, and that bronze be substituted for iron, we have still existing a few specimens, three only, at the Academy,<sup>(187)</sup> of that description of club-mounting, which will give a good idea of what a formidable weapon this club or mace was, and what its power must have been in breaking shields and helmets, if not arms and skulls at the same time.

The form of this bronze weapon, however, is opposed to what I believe to be the Firbolg construction; because its head was not received into the handle, but it receives the handle itself into its cylindrical socket. It is therefore difficult to discover by any rule derived from the peculiarities recorded in the old tracts to what party or colony it belonged; but there can be little doubt from the specimens known to us that it was invented and used for the purpose of shattering helmets and shields, and that it belonged to a period of great antiquity, and to a people well versed in the manufacture of bronze.

No Arrows, Slings, Stones, or Axes, mentioned in connection with the First Battle of Magh Tuireadh.

It is remarkable that in this account of the battle of the first or southern Magh Tuireadh, there is no mention whatever of Bows, Arrows, Slings, Stones, or Battle-Axes, though the Academy's collection contains many specimens of Axes the construction of which agrees with the recorded peculiarities of both parties; one kind having been received wedge-like into the handle,<sup>(188)</sup> the other receiving the handle into an oval

<sup>(187)</sup> [Fig. 12, (fig. 861, No. 297, Cat. R.I.A.), is of bronze—the figure one-half the real size.]

<sup>(188)</sup> [Fig. 13, (fig. 247, No. 27, Cat. R.I.A.), is 12½ inches long; 8½ inches broad, at the broadest; ⅜ of an inch thick. Fig. 14, (fig. 248, No. 72, half

socket,<sup>(189)</sup> and both apparently of equal antiquity. It is to be noted, however, as a very remarkable distinction, that while we have axes of very large size and great weight, and of various diminishing sizes, of the Firbolg or wedge-back form, we have not one large or heavy axe of the Tuatha Dé Danann or socket-kind, nor has any such been found anywhere else that I am aware of.

Having so far disposed of the arms of the Firbolgs, as described in this first battle of Magh Tuireadh, we shall now turn our attention to the arms of the Tuatha De Danann.

About thirty years after the battle of the southern Magh Tuireadh, the Second called the Northern battle of Magh Tuireadh, or more commonly the Battle of Magh Tuireadh na b-Fomhoroich, was fought between the victorious Tuatha Dé Danann and the Fomorians or Sea Rovers. And as their arms are better described in the ancient account of this second battle than in the first, and as they do not appear to have undergone any modification in the intervening time, I shall refer to that account for a description of some curious particulars relating to them.

It is stated, as I have already observed, in all our ancient authorities, that the Tuatha Dé Danann were the first to introduce pointed weapons into Erin; and as these pointed weapons must have consisted, as they are stated to have done, of spears and swords, of various sizes and forms, we have no difficulty in distinguishing them generally from the round-topped weapons of the Firbolgs. In the description in the first battle of the interview between Breias, the champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann, and Sreng, the Firbolg, Breias is said to have gone armed with two great spears and a sword; but there is nothing in this allusion to the spears to convey any idea of their particular form or characteristics. The general ancient statement, however, of these spears being pointed, and the fact that no pointed great spear has been found without a socket into which the handle was received, may of itself, I think, be received as some proof that the spears with sockets preserved in the museum of the Academy were really those ascribed to the Tuatha Dé Danann. We are not, however, dependent on mere inference or deduction, as we have in the Tale of the Battle of the second Magh

LECT. XI.

The Arms of the Tuatha Dé Danann.Descriptions of Arms in the Tale of the Second or Northern Battle, (Magh Tuireadh na b-Fomhoroich).The Spear of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

the natural size), is  $7\frac{1}{2}$  inches long,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  thick. Fig. 15, (fig. 249, No. 608),  $8\frac{1}{2}$  inches long,  $\frac{1}{2}$  an inch thick. Fig. 16, (fig. 250, No. 135), 7 inches long; 3 inches broad. Fig. 17, (fig. 251, No. 145), 7 inches long;  $3\frac{1}{2}$  inches broad. Fig. 18, (fig. 258, No. 175), is  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches long. Fig. 19, (fig. 262, No. 632), is  $6\frac{1}{2}$  inches long, and  $4\frac{1}{2}$  wide in the blade. Fig. 20, (fig. 273, No. 358), is three times the size represented in the figure.]

<sup>(189)</sup> [Fig. 21, (fig. 276, No. 444), is 4 inches long. Fig. 22, (fig. 277, No. 466), is  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches long. Fig. 23, (fig. 282, No. 468), is  $4\frac{1}{2}$  inches long.]

LECT. XI. Tuireadh such an allusion to the Spear of the Tuatha Dé Danann, as leaves no doubt whatever that our deductions from the first battle are correct.

Of Breas and Nuadha "at-gid-lamh".

After the victory of the Tuatha Dé Danann over the Firbolgs in the first battle, in which Nuadha their king lost his arm, (and was, consequently, according to our ancient law, disqualified to hold the reins of government), they set up in his place the champion Breas, who was, as it happened, of the Tuatha Dé Danann by his mother, though a Fomorían or Sea Rover by his father's side. When Breas found himself invested with the supreme power, he began to encourage the visits and incursions of the rovers, until by degrees they succeeded in gaining the ascendancy over the Tuatha Dé Danann, laying heavy tributes on them. The Tuatha Dé Danann, however, though compelled to bend their necks to these wrongs and ignominies for some time, did not bend their minds to them, but continued for three years to hold secret councils among their most influential and wise men; until at last their plans being matured and suddenly put in execution, they succeeded in banishing their oppressive king Breas from the throne, and recalled thereto their former monarch Nuadha, who had by this time recovered from his wound, and had even, we are told, had a silver arm made for him by the master artists and surgeons of his people.

The three great artifi-cers of the Tuatha Dé
Danann.

The Tuatha Dé Danann, according to their history, had among them three remarkable artificers, namely, Goibniu the smith; Creidné the Cerd, or worker in gold, silver, and bronze; and Luchtiné the carpenter; and during the three years that they held their secret councils, they secretly employed their smith in making spears and swords for the insurrection which they intended to make against their oppressors, and the warfare which was sure to follow, should they succeed in driving them out.

The forge of Goibniu.

According to a copy of an ancient tract, prose and verse, in my possession, the forge of Goibniu the Smith was, during these years, situated in the depths of the forest of Glenn Treithim, somewhere near the well-known and since so celebrated hill of Mullach Maisten (Mullagh Mast), in the present county of Kildare, in Leinster. The name and situation of this primitive Irish forge were well known at the time of compiling the tract. It was then called Cerdcha Ghaibhinn (or the forge of Goibniu) in Glenn Treithim, where the place of the furnace and the debris of the ore and coals then still remained. As this glenn lay eastwards from Mullach Maisten, and in the direction of the river Lifé (Liffey), there scarcely can be a doubt but that it was situated in the northern part of the present county of Wicklow. And the reason for this place having been selected for the situation of the forge is quite obvious, when we recollect that Wicklow was at all times known to abound in copper ore, of which metal all those ancient spears and swords are made; and also that the northern parts of the present county of Wicklow, joining and running into the county of Dublin, must of old have contained superior facilities for smelting, since we find that several generations after this period the same district, namely, that of the forests on the east side of the Liffey, is recorded to have been selected by the Milesian monarch Tighernmas for the smelting of gold and the manufacturing of vessels and trinkets therefrom.

Unimportant, in some respects, as this tradition of the Forge of Goibniu and its peculiar situation may appear to some, the fact of its existence there being handed down and believed from very remote times throws more light on the history of the manufacture of these military weapons in ancient Erin than anything that has been hitherto advanced on the subject. It is true that although the late lamented John Mitchel Kemble, accomplished scholar and antiquarian as he was, acknowledged that the early manufacture of spears and axes could not be denied to this country, because the ancient moulds for both were found in it, still he appeared to entertain doubts whether swords were also made here; but I trust that an extract which I shall subsequently have to refer to will be sufficient to show that Mr. Kemble's doubts on this subject were not well-founded.

LECTURE XII.

[Delivered 4th June, 1858.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE; (continued). Of the manufacture and repair of arms by the Tuatha Dé Danann. No mention made of any weapon except Swords and Spears, with a single exception only, in the Tale of the Cath Muighe Tuireadh. Of the Sling-Stone of Lugh, and the death of "Balór of the Evil Eye". Sling-Stones of composition manufacture. Of the Tathlum. Of the Caer-Clis; (a missive ball). Of the Caer-Comraic; (a composition ball of several colours). Use of Armour at the Battle of Magh Tuireadh. Of the inscribed Sword of Tethra. References to charmed weapons. The weapons of the Firbolgs and Tuatha Dé Danann. Weapons of the Milesians. Of the "broad green" Spear of the Gauls, introduced by Labhraidh Loingsech, (B.C. 307.) The "Gaillcans", at the Táin Bo Chuailgne. Of the arms used in the time of Eochaidh Feidhlech, (B.C. 123.) The Battle of Ath Comair;—description of the arms used there, and among others of the "Champion's Hand-Stone", (the Lia Lamha Laich.) The stone weapon unmeaningly called a "Celt". Unfounded classification of M. Worsaae and other Northern Antiquaries; their theory of the "Stone, the Bronze, and the Iron Periods". Sir R. Griffiths and Mr. J. M. Kemble, as to the arms found at Keelogue Ford. Of the Flint "Arrow-Heads" (so called), found in Ireland. Bows and Arrows not alluded to in any of our ancient Historic Tracts.

IN considering the arms of the Tuatha Dé Danann, I proceed with the ancient account of the Second Battle of Magh Tuireadh.

The anticipations of the Tuatha Dé Danann were realized; the Fomorians collected all their forces, and landed on the north-eastern coast, from which they marched into the northern Magh Tuireadh, (in the present county of Sligo,) where the battle was, after some time, fought. The Tuatha Dé Danann had just at this juncture, we are told, received a great addition to their strength in the person of a young warrior of their people, named Lug, or Lugaidh; a distinguished hero who had long been travelling in remote countries, and had returned highly accomplished in the arts and sciences of the age, both military and civil; and to this young chief they unanimously gave the command and preparation for the battle.

Manufacture
and Repair of Arms by
the *Tuatha
Dé Danann*.

Lug, accordingly, among many other professional assistants, called to his presence, the Tale tells us, the three artificers whose names I have already mentioned, namely, Goibniu,<sup>(190)</sup> the Smith; Creidné, the Cerd, or Gold- and Silver-Smith; and

<sup>(190)</sup> [This is the form of the name in Cormac's Glossary; gen. Goibmenn in the St. Gall incantations, according to Zeuss (926). The more modern form of the genitive, according to Prof. O'Curry's MS., is Gaibhinn or Ghaibhinn.]

Luchtiné, the Carpenter; and addressing the smith first, he asked him (according to the curious old tract from which I extract) what aid he could give them in the battle. Then the smith answered:

LECT. XII.
Manufacture
and Repair
of Arms by
the *Tuatha
Dé Danann*.

"Though the men of Erin should continue the battle for seven years, for every spear that falls off its handle and for every sword that breaks I will give a new weapon in place of it; and no erring or missing cast shall be thrown with any spear that is made by my hands, and no flesh into which it will enter shall ever taste the sweets of life after; and this", said he, "is more than Dubh the Fomorian smith can do".

"And you, Creidné", said Lug to the Gold- and Silver-Smith, "what aid will you give us in the battle?" "This", said Creidné, "Rivets for Spears, and Hilts for Swords, and Bosses and Rims for Shields, shall be supplied by me to all our men".

"And you, Luchtiné", said Lug to the carpenter, "what aid will you give us in the battle?" "This", said Luchtiné, "a full sufficiency of Shields and of Spear-handles shall be supplied by me to them".—(etc.)

When the time of battle came, the Fomorians wondered at what they saw of the arms of the Tuatha Dé Danann in the course of the conflict, as the tale relates:

"They saw their own arms, that is, their spears and their swords, injured and useless after the fight; but it was not so with the Tuatha Dé Danann, for if their arms were rendered useless to-day, they were in perfect order for battle the next day, because Goibniu the Smith was in the forge, making swords, and javelins, and spears; and he made these arms by three turns, or spells, and they were perfectly finished by the third turn. And Luchtiné the carpenter made the spear-handles by three chippings, and the third chipping was a finish".

"When the smith had finished a spear-head", says the tract, (describing as usual in exaggerated poetical language the mode of operation, which in substance was that in all probability really pursued by the artificers), "he threw it from his tongs towards the door-post, in which it stuck by the point; and then Luchtiné the carpenter had the handle ready, and threw it so accurately that it entered the socket of the spear, and became so exactly fixed, that it required no further setting".

Creidné the Cerd, again, according to the same authority, (using the same extravagant style of language), made the rivets by "three turns";—"and the third turn was a finish; and then he pitched them from his tongs into the holes in the socket of the spear, so as, without further boring, to pass

LECT. XII.

Manufacture
and Repair
of Arms by
the *Tuatha
Dé Danann*.

through it and the handle, fastening them so firmly as to require no further attention".—(etc.)

Then the Fomorians, continues this history, feeling the effects of the unfailing weapons of their opponents, sent one of their people to discover the order and arrangement of the camp of the Tuatha Dé Danann. This man's name was Ruadan, and he was the son of Breas of the Fomorians, but his mother was Brigh, daughter of Daghda, the great chief and champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann; and on the strength of this relationship he gained free access to their camp. Having examined its arrangements, accordingly, Ruadan returned to the Fomorians, and informed them of the performances of the Smith, the Carpenter, and the Cerd; and they sent him back again with instructions to kill the Smith if possible. Returning again to the camp, therefore, Ruadan, we are told, asked for a spear-head from the Smith, and its rivets from the Cerd, and its handle from the Carpenter, and they were given to him. But a fourth artificer is here also mentioned; for we are next told that there was in the camp a woman whose occupation it was to grind the arms on a grinding or whet-stone, and that her name was Cron, and that she was the mother of Fianlugh; and it was she, says our authority, that ground this new spear for Ruadan, who no sooner received it finished, than he returned to the smith, and threw the spear at him and wounded him. But the smith drew forth the spear from his own person, and cast it at Ruadan with such force, that it passed through his body and killed him on the spot.

Such is the account given of the arms used by the Tuatha Dé Danann, at the battle of the second Magh Tuireadh, and of the mode and manner of making, fitting, mounting, and grinding them. It is extravagant in the details, (as in those concerning the manufacture and putting together of the weapons); but there can be no difficulty in extracting the plain prose facts from this poetic account of them. And that it may not be supposed that this Tale is merely a romantic one, got up in comparatively modern times, I have the satisfaction to state that the part of it which describes the three artificers, the Smith, the Carpenter, and the Cerd, is preserved, word for word, in an authority no less respectable than the celebrated Glossary compiled at the close of the ninth century (nearly one thousand years ago), by the learned Cormac MacCullinan, king of Munster and archbishop of Cashel, who extracts it evidently from the old story, and this story must even at that early period have been very ancient, else Cormac would not have quoted it as an authority as he does. I may add, that it is with full credence, too, apparently, of its historic truth, that he alludes to the Tale, for he refers to a circumstance which he says occurred in the smith's family, whilst he was engaged during the battle in the making of the spears as described. LECT. XII.

It is remarkable that there is no reference whatever in this tale, any more than in the preceding account of the battle of the southern Magh Tuireadh, to the Tuatha Dé Danann having any other arms but swords and spears; nor any reference to arrows, darts, axes, clubs, stones, or slings,—excepting, indeed, that the Sling and a Sling-Stone are once mentioned in it. This sling and stone, however, belonged to, and were used by, the champion Lugh, who ordered and conducted the battle on the side of the Tuatha Dé Danann, but who may, perhaps, be supposed to have learned the use of the weapon during his long travels abroad.

No mention but of Swords, Spears, and (in one instance) a Sling-Stone in the Cath Maighé Tuireadh.

This allusion to the use of the Sling is as follows. In the heat of the battle, a Fomorian warrior and chief named Balór, was dealing fearful destruction among the Tuatha Dé Danann, not more by the sword and spear, than by a certain natural (or rather very unnatural) gift which he possessed. This was no other, says the tract, than an Evil Eye, which he generally kept covered, but to the effect of which he gave free range in this battle. (And here may be observed an example of the manner in which supernatural powers were, in these historic tracts, just as in Homer, frequently attributed to the more destructive heroes whose feats are described, as if to account for their intolerable superiority.) Among those who were struck down by the power of this evil eye, according to the story, were Nuada “of the silver-hand” himself, the king of the Tuatha Dé Danann, and the lady Macha, daughter of Ernmas; after whose deaths it appears Balór closed the magical eye again. Thereupon the champion of the Tuatha Dé Danann, Lugh, perceiving what had happened, dauntlessly went up, we are told in the tale, to the fierce warrior, whose fatal eye was at this moment closed, and denouncing his cruelty threatened him with instant death. Then Balór, hearing such taunts and threats, proceeded to raise the lid of the evil eye; but no sooner did Lugh see the movement of the lid, than he darted a Sling-Stone, says the ancient writer of the tale, at the eye, which accurately attaining its mark, drove it through his skull; and the terrible Balór fell dead among his people.

The Sling-Stone of Lugh, and death of Balór “of the Evil Eye”.

In this passage it is not said, however, that it was from a sling the stone was cast, but only that it was a “sling-stone”, a “lic-tuilmé”; and whether or not Lugh alone of all the warriors engaged in this battle was acquainted with the use of the sling, we have no satisfactory means of determining, unless we admit

LECT. XII. the value of the negative evidence in the fact that no farther allusion to it is to be found in this ancient tract. It is proper to observe, however, that in the Book of Leinster we are told that it was with a stone from his sling, "tabaill", that Lugh killed Balór, (who was, we are also told in this version of the story, Lugh's own grandfather).

Sling-Stones of composition
manufacture.

There is a short but very curious ancient poem still in existence, which gives an extravagant romantic account of the origin and composition of this very sling-stone by which Balór's "evil eye" was destroyed; from which it appears that it was an artificial composition, a "tathlum", or conglomeration. The following is a literal translation of the passage:

- "A Tathlum, heavy, fiery, firm,
Which the Tuatha Dé Danann had with them,
It was that broke the fierce Balór's eye,
Of old, in the battle of the great armies.
"The blood of toads and furious bears,
And the blood of the noble lion,
The blood of vipers, and of Osmuinn's trunks;—
It was of these the Tathlum was composed.
"The sand of the swift Armorian Sea;
And the sand of the teeming Red Sea;—
All these, being first purified, were used In the composition of the Tathlum.
"Briun the son of Bethar, no mean warrior,
Who on the ocean's eastern border reigned;—
It was he that fused, and smoothly formed,
It was he that fashioned the Tathlum.
"To the hero Lugaidh was given
This concrete ball,—no soft missile;—
In Magh Tuireadh of shrieking wails,
From his hand he threw the Tathlum".

Of this very curious poem I have a transcript which I made from the only copy I have ever seen, one preserved in an ancient vellum manuscript formerly in the possession of Mr. W. Monck Mason, but lately sold at a public auction in London.

The Tath-
lum.

But this is not the only instance of a Tathlum to be found in our ancient writings; for it occurs, though under a different name, in an article on the origin of the name of Dubh-linn, (now Dublin), in the ancient topographical tract called the Dinnseanchas, preserved in several of our oldest manuscripts. This article gives an account of the death of the lady Dubh, from whom the river Liffey derived the name of Dubh-linn;—(the word literally means the Black Pool, if we were to translate the name of the lady Dubh);—and the following is the verse from it in which such a ball as that of which I have been LECT. XII.

speaking is mentioned:—

“Mairgen the pure and happy, perceived her,
He was the high-favoured servant of Ochinn;
He cast a Caer-Clis at her path,
By which he killed the daughter of king Rodubh.<sup>(191)</sup>

This caer-clis was a missive ball, though every ball or ordinary missive was not called a caer. A caer was always a ball formed of many ingredients, and sometimes of many colours; and when it happened to be of a mosaic character, as having many distinct lines or ribs, or ingredients or colours, it was then called a caer-comraic, or ball of convergent ribs or lines.

The Caer-Clis. (a missive Ball).

The stanza quoted above is taken from the Book of Leinster, and the line which runs there, “He cast a caer-clis on her path”, is written in the same article in the Book of Lecain thus: “He cast a stone from his sling on her path”; thus establishing without any doubt that the tathlum and caer-clis were artificial Sling missives.

From this digression let us return again to the battle-field of the second Magh Tuireadh, in the account of which there are still some particulars respecting arms and armour, which we cannot afford to pass over.

It is stated distinctly in the Tale that there was not a chief or a man of valour in the whole army of the Fomorians, who was not furnished with a “lorica” on his body, a helmet on his head, a manais (or broad-spear) in his right hand, a “heavy sharp sword” at his girdle, and a “firm shield” at his shoulder. And in describing the battle at its greatest heat, the writer again enumerates the weapons which were used by both parties, in the following words:

Use of Armour at the Battle of Magh Tuireadh.

“Fearful, indeed, was the thunder which rolled over the battle-field; the shouts of the warriors, the breaking of the shields, the flashing and clashing of the swords, of the straight tooth-hilted swords,—[that is, hilted with hilts formed of the tooth of the sea-horse],—the music and harmony of the ‘belly-darts’, and the sighing and winging of the spears and the lances”.<sup>(192)</sup>

And again, a curious circumstance regarding the construction of the hilted swords is referred to, where the tract records that

(191) original:—Ror pachaig mairggin glan gnuo, gilla, co n-ápo péir Ochinn,
focheirio chaen clir ar conair,
oiran bhuir ingen nig Rodubh.

(192) original:—Amnúr oin, an tairneach puboi anto rechnon an catáe a.
gair na laechairio, ocu bneirib na rciat; loimreoch ocu fearogair na cloroem ocu na calc n-óed; canéiu ocu gnuoegar na raigro-bole;
ocu rian ocu eiciguo na fogair, ocu na ngabluch.

LECT. XII.

The Inscribed
Sword of Tethra.

in the flight of the Fomorians from the battle-field, Tethra, their king, lost his sword. This passage is as follows:

"It was in this battle that Ogma the champion obtained Ornai, the sword of Tethra, king of the Fomorians. Ogma opened the sword and cleaned it. Then the sword related all the deeds that had been performed by it; for it was the custom of swords at this time, when opened, to recount the deeds that had been performed with them. And it is therefore that swords are entitled to the tribute of cleaning them whenever they are opened. It is on this account, too, that charms are preserved in swords, from that time down. Now, the reason why demons were accustomed to speak from weapons at that time, was, because arms were worshipped by people in those times, and arms were among the protections (or sanctuaries) of those times".<sup>(193)</sup>

References to charmed Weapons.

There are many references to charmed swords and spears to be met with in our ancient writings, as will appear in the course of these lectures; but I have never met any account of a sword that "spoke", except this; and the legend is, perhaps, unique, unless we take it in the sense that the names of the battles or deeds in which the sword had been employed had been inscribed on it, perhaps in Ogham, or some sort of secret writing or symbols. I have, indeed, met with a curious instance of the hilt of a sword being opened in much later though still ancient times, when an inscription was found on the shank which decided the ownership. The particulars of this curious fact I shall have to relate on another occasion.

I have been thus tedious in recounting the names and number of the weapons which are stated to have been used in this ancient battle, in order that no one should have room to say that anything has been left out which would in any way clash with the opinions which have been for the first time expressed in the course of this lecture, on the variety and distinctive characters of the offensive weapons mentioned in these two ancient tracts on the two battles of Magh Tuireadh. And it is a remarkable circumstance, and one that ought to stamp with some authority the traditional history of these battles thus preserved, that the fewness of the weapons mentioned in them, the arrangements of the fight described, and the simplicity of the description of it, should bear a character so widely differing from the more glowing, and sometimes I may add much less probable, descriptions of the warfare of subsequent ages. LECT. XII.

(193) original:—Ír an catrín sin, fuair Ogmaí tenefer Ornai, cláirem tethra ní fomoirie. To forlaic Ogma in cláirem ocus glanair é. Ír an mór in cláirem nach(a) noemao de, ar (ba) bér do cláirem in tan rín do corrlleir, do aobair na gníma do gnítea sib. Conno de rín olegair cláirem eir a nglantaí iar na corlucab. Ír de, ono, forcoméar brechta hi cláirem ó rín amaí. Ír aipe rín no labraoir deomna d'áimair ír an áimrírín, ar no aobair airín ó dáimín ír in rín; ocus bato comairéib na háimrír na háimrín.

It will be remembered that the weapons used in the battle of the first, or southern Magh Tuireadh, fought between the Firbolgs and the Tuatha Dé Danann, were, on the part of the former, first, the craisech, or broad-blade spear, with an oval, not a pointed end, not unlike that of a duck's bill; second, the fiarlann, or curved blade; third, the sword; fourth, the iron or bronze mounted club; and (probably) a fifth in what may be called the hybrid spear or lance, which embraced the peculiar characteristics of the spears of both parties,—namely, in having a flat blade received by a shank into the handle like the Firbolg weapons, and sharp sides, but no deep socket and swollen centre to receive the handle and receive the blade, like the Tuatha Dé Danann spear. These were the well-defined arms of the Firbolgs; while those of the Tuatha Dé Danann were, first, the sharp-pointed narrow spear or sleigh, for casting,—which had sockets hollowed in the blades, running generally almost to the very point, and forming on the upper surface either a gracefully diminishing rounded ridge, or more generally a low spine, broad at the bottom, and rising to a sharp external edge;<sup>(194)</sup> second, the manais or broad trowel-shaped spearhead for thrusting, having a socket similar to the Sleigh;<sup>(195)</sup> and third, the claidheamh or sword, generally flagger-shaped and pointed, and invariably double-edged. And in the battle of the second or northern Magh Tuireadh we find a distinct account of the manufacture on the spot of the Sword and the Spear, as the only weapons of the Tuatha Dé Danann. Whether their spear varied in size we cannot say, nor does the description of the arms of the Fomorians add a single weapon to those, but that the writer makes use of some synonyms. It is remark-

Distinction between the Weapons of the Tuatha Dé Danann and the Firbolgs.

<sup>(194)</sup> [See Fig. 24. (No. 6, fig. 362, R.I.A. Catal.) is 13½ inches long. Fig. 25, (No. 26, fig. 364, R.I.A. Catal.) is 15 inches long. Fig. 26, (No. 18, fig. 374) is no less than 26¾ inches long. Fig. 27, (No. 252, fig. 373), 11½ inches. Fig. 28, (No. 34, fig. 374), is 11½ inches long. Fig. 29, (No. 215, fig. 379), is 5½ inches long. The illustrations Figs. 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, (figs. 369, 370, 384, 385, 386, R.I.A. Cat.), by their shape seem to belong to the class of Manais, or broad thrusting spear, next described; but their eyelet holes, employed to fasten the spur chord used in drawing back the spear when thrown, seem to show that they were casting spears like the Sleigh. Fig. 35, (No. 59, fig. 369), is 4½ inches by 1½. Fig. 36, (No. 239, fig. 370), is 6½ inches long. Fig. 37, (No. 191, fig. 384), 7½ inches. Fig. 38, (No. 192, fig. 385), is 5 inches long, by 1½. Fig. 39, (No. 234, fig. 386), is 7½ inches long.

<sup>(195)</sup> [Fig. 40, (No. 125, fig. 368, R.I.A. Cat.), is 5½ inches long, by 2 inches across the widest part of the blade. It is a rude specimen, but presents the characteristic type of the shape above described. The broad spears alluded to in the last note may also, perhaps, be classed under this category.]

LECT. XII.

able, too, that neither the craisech, the fiarlann, nor the fersad (club) of the Firbolgs is at all spoken of in this second battle, from which it might perhaps be inferred that the arms of the Firbolgs had disappeared with their power in the country, and that from that time down the Tuatha Dé Danann type, (which appears to be identical with that of the Fomorians), with some variety in the spear as to size and style of manufacture, continued as the universal model in use in all the country.

Weapons of the Milesians.

Of the Gaulish "broad green" Spear introduced by Labhraidh Loingsech, (A.C. 307, according to O'Flaherty.)

There is no account preserved of the arms which the subsequent Milesians brought with them at their coming; and no distinction can, therefore, be drawn between them and those of their immediate predecessors, if any such existed. And as we have no detailed description of the various battles which their descendants fought among themselves for many centuries after, we are shut out from all means of comparison. There is, however, in our ancient writings some slight reference to what, perhaps, may be considered the introduction of a new, or at least a modified type, into Erin, many years after the Milesian conquest, so late as three hundred years before the birth of Christ. This was the "Broad Spear" brought from Gaul by Labhraidh Loingsech, whose adventures, it may be remembered, formed the subject of one of the historic tales of which I gave a detailed account on a former occasion,<sup>(196)</sup> and in which this reference is found.

I shall not here recapitulate the story of Prince Labhraidh's flight into France on the murder of his father and grandfather by his grand-uncle Cobthach Cael, nor of his subsequent return to Erin when he grew up to manhood at the head of an army of Gauls given him by the friendly king of that country. The battle of Dinn Righ, in which Labhraidh and his Gauls slew king Cobthach and recovered his kingdom, is placed by O'Flaherty at A.M. 3682, or, according to his chronology, B.C. 307; and the death of Labhraidh (who reigned under the title of Labraidh Loingsech), A.M. 3696, or B.C. 293. O'Flaherty's account of this king introduces the new weapon brought by him from France, but does not describe it correctly. An investigation of the authorities will, however, I think, make this curious subject clear enough.

O'Flaherty, accounting for the name of the province of Leinster, (Laighean), says that "it has obtained that appellation from the word lancea, a javelin; and the broad-pointed weapons which these foreigners imported hither, were till then unknown to our countrymen".<sup>(197)</sup> Now, if O'Flaherty were right in describing the spears or javelins of those Gallic warriors who came into Ireland with Labraidh Loingsech as "broad-pointed" weapons, the opinion which I have put forward in my last lecture, that this was the peculiar character of the weapons of the Firbolgs, would be incorrect. And the authority of O'Flaherty is in general a high one upon such subjects. I must, however, be allowed to say (and I think I can very satisfactorily prove it), that O'Flaherty, in his translation of Irish phrases, and in his rendering of passages from ancient Irish history, is very often inaccurate. And I think a little examination will prove the present to be one instance among those of his mistakes of this kind.

<sup>(196)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials, etc., p. 251.

<sup>(197)</sup> Ogygia; vol. ii.; p. 138; (Hely's Translation.)

FIG. XII.
Of the Gaulish "broad green" Spear. Introduced by Labraidh Loingsech, (u.c. 807, according to O'Flaherty.)

It may be remembered that in a former lecture,<sup>(198)</sup> I quoted from the Book of Leinster a poem which I endeavoured to show had been written by Perceirtne, an Ulster poet, who flourished at the beginning of the Christian Era, and which poem contains the presumed origin of the provincial names of Ulster, Munster, and Leinster. The following is the stanza of this important poem which gives the origin of Leinster:—

"It was Labraidh Loingsech of ample force,

That slew Cobthach at Dinnrigh;

With a spear-armed host from beyond the broad sea,—

It is from these [spears] that Laighen (Leinster) was named".<sup>(199)</sup>

And another stanza, quoted in the ancient tract on the etymology of proper names, and which is also quoted by the Rev. Dr. Keting, runs thus:—

"Two hundred and twenty hundreds of Gauls

With broad-spears hither came;

From these spears, without reproach,

It was that Leinster received its name".<sup>(200)</sup>

Dr. Keting quotes these stanzas; and very strangely precedes the latter stanza by the following observations:

"It was by him (Labraidh) that broad-green laighins were first made in Erin. Laighins are the same as sleaghs [spears], which had broad-green heads [or blades] of iron; and it was from these laighins the Gailian province, which is now called

<sup>(198)</sup> See ante, Lect. I., p. 8.

<sup>(199)</sup> original:—*Labraidh Loingsech, lón a lin, Ro oir Cobthach i nDinn righ,
Co rluag laigneo oar lino lin,
Oib no h-ainmnigtea laigin,*

<sup>(200)</sup> original:—*Oá déc an fíor déc n-gall,
Co laigin leatna léo anall;
Oo na laigin rin, cen ail,
Oib no h-ainmnigtea laigin.*

[See p. 9 ante, where the translation of this stanza is somewhat different; that here given appears to accord better with the original text.]

LECT. XII.

Of the Gaulish "broad green" Spear, introduced by Labhraidh Loingsech, (B.C. 807, according to O'Flaherty.)

the Laighin province, was named"<sup>(801)</sup>—[that is the present province of Leinster.]

Dr. Keting appears to have departed a little from his accustomed accuracy here, in stating that Labhraidh Loingsech himself was the first to invent or make the "green broad spears", when he had the above two stanzas before him, which distinctly state, as do all the ancient prose authorities, that the Gaulish troops brought those particular spears into Erin at their coming over. Keting, moreover, adds a very important reading, if it were but true; namely, that those broad-green spears were made of "iron". For this assertion, however, there is not the slightest foundation, as in no authority in which the bringing over of these spears is mentioned, is there the remotest reference to the metal of which they were made; but from their being invariably called Laigné Leathan-glása, literally "Broad-green Spears", there can be no doubt whatever that the first writers of the story had green Bronze spears in their view, and not spears of Iron, which never could have been called glása, or "green". I need scarcely add that O'Flaherty's assertion, that these laighins were "broad-pointed" weapons, had no better foundation than his own mere idea of applying the term "broad" to the point, and not to the general shape of the whole weapon, which is all that is described in the old stanzas from which both he and Keting derived their information.

I have already quoted a verse from an ancient poem to show that the Sleagh, or Spear, of the Tuatha Dé Danann was called also a laighin, so that the term laighin does not make any distinction between their spears and those of the Gauls. The distinction is that the latter are, as I have said, invariably represented as being "broad" and "green". I may add here that in all my readings I find that both the sleagh and the laighin, whatever their particular form, were weapons to be cast from the hand, as well as to be used in thrusting into the opponent; whilst the manais and the craisech of the later times, (which, however, are very seldom mentioned as of later times), were mainly used for thrusting or stabbing only.

It would be carrying scepticism to an unreasonable length to deny that those foreigners who came into Erin in the following of Labhraidh Loingsech did, in fact, bring with them a description of spear which in some particulars differed from the weapon of the same kind with which the natives had been from remote times acquainted. Nothing else could have induced our ancient writers to notice and put on record such an apparently insignificant incident, if it had not, even during the course of ages, continued to be believed as a fact, and as one, moreover, connected with the distinctive name of the people, and the territory into which they were first introduced.

(801) original:—"Ar leir do rionad laigne leathan-glása ar túr an éirinn. Inann, umorro laigne agus rleaga ar a m-bíoir cinn leathan-glása ianann; agus ar ó na laignib rin gairmdean laigni do cuigeao Éailian rir a párocean cuigeao laisean ann".

There is, in my opinion, even still stronger evidence of the authenticity of this ancient story, in the existence, even to this day, of a few specimens of these "broad green" Gaulish spears. I need only refer to the splendid specimen of a broad bronze spear-head, of the most ancient workmanship, in the Academy Museum, one of the most remarkable specimens in the whole collection,<sup>(102)</sup> and then appeal to the eye as to whether this broad spear, with very rounded hips and rapidly tapering point, does not agree fully with the description of the Gaulish spear, the true laighin lethan-glas.

It is probable that there were much larger specimens of these spears in use in ancient times, though not known to us now; and it is also probable that there was some variety in the shape, and that the manais, or trowel-hip, may have characterized some of them at the root with a straighter outline from that to the point. And this also is explainable.

Probable variety in the Gaulish
Spears.

The foreigners who attended Labhraidh Loingsech back to his own country were not all of the same nation, but were, we know, composed of three different sections or parties, under three different names: Domnans, Gailleans, and Laighins. Of these three parties the Gailleans appear to have been the bravest and most warlike; and, in fact, they continued to flourish and distinguish themselves in the military affairs of Ireland from the time of Labhraidh Loingsech down to the period of the Táin Bo Cuailgne, when Ailill, the husband of Medbh, queen of Connacht, (himself a Leinsterman), invited a body of three thousand of them to take part in that famous cattle spoil.

It will be remembered, (for I have given an account of the Táin Bo Cuailgne on a former occasion), that preparatory to setting out on this great expedition, the men of Connacht, Munster, and Leinster, assembled at Rath Cruachain,—(the royal palace of Connacht, which was situated near the present town of Carrick-on-Shannon in the county of Roscommon). From Cruachan they proceeded in the direction of Athlone, in order to cross the Shannon into Meath; and at the end of the first day's march, according to the history, they halted at a place called Cuil Silinni (now the name of a parish and church in the

The Gall-
teans at the Táin Bo
Cuailgne.

<sup>(102)</sup> This splendid spear-head—Fig 41, (No. 249, fig. 365, R.I.A.)—is 13½ inches long, and 3½ inches broad at the broadest part.

LECT. XII.

The Gaulleons at the Táin Bo
Chuatigné.

barony and county of Roscommon). Here they encamped for the night; and it is in reference to this halt that the tale contains the following curious allusion to the Gaulish contingent, the description of whose activity, dexterity, and energy, may remind us of that of the French troops, under somewhat similar circumstances, on a late remarkable occasion.

When Queen Medbh saw the superior alertness of the Gaulleons in providing for the comforts of the night's encampment, she felt jealous of it for her Connacht people, because the Gaulleons were her husband's countrymen; and she resolved to check them and even send them back again, lest they should claim more of the credit of the expedition, should it prove favourable, than her own people. The story runs thus:

"Queen Medbh did not permit that her chariot should be put up or her horses unyoked, until she had gone through the whole camp. Then Medbh's chariot was put up and her horses unyoked; and she went and sat by the side of her husband, Ailill the son of Magach: and Ailill asked her if she had discovered among the troops those who were pleased or displeased, or unwilling to go on the expedition.

"It is idle for any one to go upon it", said Medbh, 'but the one party only, that is the three thousand Gaulleons. 'What good have they done that they are thus praised?' said Ailill. 'They are deserving of praise', said Medbh. 'At the time that all others had commenced to make good their encampment, these had finished their huts and their tents: at the time that all others had finished their huts and their tents, these had finished the preparation of their food and drink; at the time that all others had finished the preparation of food and drink, these had finished the eating of their meal; at the time that all others had finished the eating of their meal, these were soundly asleep; and in the same way that their slaves and their servants have excelled the slaves and the servants of the men of Erin, so also will their brave champions and their brave warriors excel the other brave champions and the brave warriors of the other men of Erin on this expedition'".<sup>(203)</sup>

<sup>(203)</sup> original:—ní amlacair meob ara curpta a'cappat, no ara pcoptes a eic co ná lao cor vi ipin vunaó. anorain na viciaput eich meobe, ocur na curmat a cappat, ocur verrio ar lám aillila mic mágaé: ocur conpocta aillill récla vi meob ar co ferreo meob cia lair maó lamo no nemlamo, no lar maó leic in pluagaó.

heppac vo neot a tñall aet vono oen fiallac, ar meob, edon vo tñicat cét na ngailleon. Cia maic fo gniat in tan moltar peé cáé, ar aillill. fail obug molta ranno, ar meob. tñach no gab cáé vunaó ocur longport vo venam, no reach voibrium bota, ocur béircalam vo venam; tñat, no reach na cáé bota acar béircalam, tannac voibrium upnam bro ocur lenna; tñat tannac vo cáé upnam bro acar lenna.

Notwithstanding Queen Medbh's jealousy of the brave Gail-LECT. XII.
leans, she eventually consented, though with reluctance, to allow them to share in the expedition; and all our accounts of them testify to the efficiency with which they filled every post of valour and danger which fell to their lot during that tedious war. Such, however, was the envy and jealousy, if not the fears, which their valour and fame had raised against them in the country, that the Druids of Erin, whether at the instigation of Queen Medbh or not I cannot say, pronounced withering satires and incantations against them, (according to the story); so that their whole race became extinct in the land, excepting a few, and these few of the "Gallians", as well as the whole of their fellow foreign tribes, the Laighiuns and the Domnanns, were afterwards totally extirpated by the monarch Tuathal Teachtmair, on his accession to the throne of Erin, A.D. 79.

This is, however, a digression for which I must ask indulgence, while I resume the thread of my account of the various arms known to our early history.

After the reign of Labhraidh Loingsech (which terminated, as we have already said, about three hundred years before the Incarnation), we have no account of any particular addition to the national weapons of warfare, down to the time of the monarch Eochaidh Feidhlech, whose reign ended 5069, according to the annals of the Four Masters, or B.C. 123, according to their chronology.

Arms used in the time of Eochaidh Feidhlech, (A.D. 123).

This monarch was the father of the celebrated Medbh, queen of Connacht, of whom we have been just speaking; and besides her and other daughters he had three sons, who were born at one birth, and were in consequence called Na Tri Finn Emhna, "the three Fair Twins" (or Triplets). These young princes were nursed and educated at the royal palace of Emania in Ulster; and as the great House of the Royal Branch was then in full glory, it is to be presumed that it was there that they received their military education among the many valiant champions who then graced it.

The ambition of these brothers grew with their manhood; and they resolved to request their father, who was then old, to abdicate the sovereignty of Erin and the palace of Tara in their favour. The old king on hearing this request indignantly refused to grant it; whereupon the princes sent him a challenge

Battle of Ath Cómair.

poircaid dóibíurum ppaíno acap comait; epát poircaid do éad ppaíno acap comait, baéaprom na corlaio anopaíve. Feib pa veígeíep a noaep acap moíaoí ve veípaib acap moíaoíab pep nh-epenn, veígeíe a noeílaíe acap a noeíóíe ve veí laícaib acap ve veígoaib pep nh-epenn in'chupra rop in epluaíao.

LECT. XII.

Battle of Ath Comair.

of battle; and collecting a large body of followers in Ulster, they marched at their head round by the north of the island to Ballyshannon, into Connacht, and did not stop until they reached the palace of Cruachan, in that country. The old king meanwhile was not idle; he collected about him his chief champions and all his forces, and marching at their head from Tara westwards, he encamped at the hill of Druim Criadh, (now Drumcree, in the parish of Kilmumny, barony of Delvin, and county of Westmeath). His rebellious sons immediately crossed the Shannon, and marched directly to Druim Criadh, where they took up a position in the immediate neighbourhood of the king, at Ath Comair, [the "Ford of the Confluence"], on a river that passes by the hill into Loch Dairbrech. The following short quotation from the old tract makes mention of the arms which were used on both sides, when the two parties met in this battle:

Descriptions of the Arms used.

"Then the brave battalions on both sides fought with the swelling faces of their bright shields, and with the points of their broad green laighins; and they threw thick close showers of their battle missiles at each other, until they came within easy distance of flying their wide-socketed craisechs, and their spear-like sharp manaíscs, and they rushed upon each other with their long, narrow, flame-flashing swords".<sup>(204)</sup>

The Craisech at this time, I should observe, is mentioned as having a socket.

And again:

"And it was in such manner that the battalions hurled at each other their red, most venomous, weapons; namely, their whirring swift-flying darts, and their sharp-pointed poison-dripping javelins, and their smooth well-riveted easily cast sleaghs [or spears]".<sup>(205)</sup>

So far it will be observed that the missive weapons in general, at both sides, consisted of darts, javelins, short spears, and full spears, or craisechs.

Of the Arms and mode of fighting of Lothar in the Battle of Ath Comair; and of the "Champion's Stone".

The particular achievements of each of the three rebellious sons of the king—Breas, Nar, and Lothar—are fully detailed in this tract; but as none of them merits particular attention here but those of the youngest son, I shall only quote here as

<sup>(204)</sup> original (fol. 18): tr annrín do comairceas na caca crosa cé-tarra, do tulaib na ríat ríamra, ríeallbalgaca, ocus ro pennatib na laigen letan-glár; ocus tucpat ríara ríena ríena tuig, olánte ra nair-íscib cacha rón a céile, no go pangatar ro ro-cup a craisceat crosairínges, ocus ar a manaírib móra muirneca, miorí-gepa; ocus no innraig cáe a céile ríob le cloromib caefaebraca, coimíoll-faebraca.

<sup>(205)</sup> original (fol. 19): *tr amlaro rín tpa, no vicuipioar na caca rón a céile
a n-airm fáile ruada, no neimneca .i. ai raigoe ríangairle, ríonluaca, ocus a ríoga bíoipaca bráom neimneca, ocus a ríeá, remneca, ríonbríeate.*

much of the text as relates to his share and that of his party in the battle: LECT. XII.

"And there came not a man of Lothar's party without a broad-green laighin [spear], or without a burnished shield, or without a Champion's Hand-Stone in the hollow cavities of their bent shields. * * * *"

Battle of Ath Comair.

"As to Lothar himself, he went forward to the brink of the ford, to where he perceived his father; and he saw his father in the middle of the ford, with Conall Cearnach on his right, and Cet, son of Magach, on his left, guarding him. And as each of his men brought a champion's stone, Lothar himself came with his likewise; and Lothar then raised his arm quickly, and he put the strength of his body to his wrist, and the strength of his wrist to his hand, and the strength of his hand to the champion's stone, and he hurled a straight unavoidable throw of it towards his father, where he stood in the rear of the battle; and he sent the thick stone with a rotatory motion to the middle of the ford, and it sailed directly towards the high king. And when Cet, son of Magach, and Conall Cearnach, son of Amergin, saw this, they simultaneously raised their two great shields against it.

"Notwithstanding this, however, the powerful champion-stone passed between the two, onwards, until it struck the high king fully on the breast, so that it struck him down prostrate across the middle of the ford, with his broad kingly shield and his array of valour and bravery laid low in the dark waters of Ath Comair, throwing up black frothy blood into the stream.

"The King of Erin soon started up, however, and he put his foot on the stone where he saw that it fell, and buried it, so that there remains but a third part of it over ground; and he kept his foot on it as long as the battle continued; and it lives still in the ford, and the print of his foot is in it, and will live in it for ever".<sup>(206)</sup>

<sup>(206)</sup> original (fol. 23): Ocur ní éamhc fear do muinntir lothair gan laighin leatánglar, ocur gan fear ceit connleac, ocur gan lig lámha laoié a ceuar-tollair na ceuim-riac. * * * *

Dála lothair, umorro, do éuair-ren go hup an áta, áit a b'fearo a áthair; ocur do connair-ren a áthair a ceptan áta, ocur Conall Cear-nach ar a deir, acur Cet mac Magach for a éli agá iméoméo. Ocur amail tuc cad fear a éloc leir tuc lothair mar an ceona. Ocur po tógair lothair iarrin an lámh go veair, veítaparo, ocur tuc neart a colna ar a nige, acur neart a nige ar a doirn, ocur neart a duirn for an áta feóma, ocur do pas upéar vípéac do víngbala, v'innraige a áthar oi, áit a parb ar éul an éata: ocur do minne poa peimoiubairce don peamar lia ar forar lán an áta, ocur do po gab go feolta v'innraige an aip-rig. O do connair Cet mac Magach ocur Conall Cearnac mac Ainir-gin an ní rin, po tógabair an dá fearé lánmópa an don-uair ina haéaró.

Cú éra áit do éuair an lia foirtille feóma roir in dá fearé riap, go carla car leatan áta ocur upbuinne do, n aiprig, innur gur leag faen, roatanna for lán-mheóan an áta hé; go na riac píoga, po leatan, ocur

LECT. XII.

I may add to this extract that the three young princes were defeated, and fled with the remnant of their shattered forces back again over the Shannon, into Connacht, hotly pursued by their father's forces, who overtook and killed them and then returned in triumph to the old king.

Of the 'Lia
Lamha Laich', or
"Champion's
Hand-Stone"

Having spoken of this battle more at length in two former lectures, I should not have referred to it again but for the purpose of introducing the important archaeological fact of a new weapon of offence which appears for the first time in the Battle of Ath Comair, save that it is mentioned in one other historical tract which has reference to a period but forty years before this, and of which you shall immediately hear. This curious weapon of offence is the "Lia Lamha Laich", or "Champion's Hand-Stone".

It will be observed that this formidable weapon is not spoken of as having been carried by every man in the battle, nor even by the men in general of either side, but only by every man who belonged to the party of which Lothar, the youngest of the three brothers, was commander, and by Lothar himself. And as the army of the rebellious brothers probably consisted of irregulars, taken up chiefly from the people of Ulster, it is, perhaps, not too much to suppose that those men who were all armed with "Champions' Hand-Stones" were either some particular tribe, or else the natives of some particular district, in which the use and manufacture of these stone weapons was more generally if not peculiarly practised at the time.

It cannot be supposed for a moment that the "Lia Lamha Laich", or Champion's Hand-Stone, was any shapeless lump of a stone which offered itself for the occasion. We have it from this ancient tale that Lothar and his men came with these stones "stowed" away in the hollows of their shields; and certainly this fact of itself implies distinctly enough that the stone must have been of a shape and size the most convenient for carriage, and probably that which was found to be the best balanced for throwing from the hand, and the best calculated for stunning, for cutting, or for penetrating the object at which it was cast.

The Stone weapon unmeaningly called a
"Celt".

Now, it is satisfactory to find all these requisites singularly developed in what is unmeaningly called the stone "Celt" of Ireland, the simple stone weapon which is so often turned up gona tneallam goile ocuḡ gairḡr, a bfoḡar-linnrḡ aḡa Comair, gḡr cḡrnearḡar uan-cḡban oḡb-fḡla ḡar a bḡl ḡr in linn.

Ocuḡ nḡ eḡuḡ nḡ cḡpenn ruar annrḡn, ocuḡ an t-ionao ma facarḡ an cloc oḡ ḡairḡrḡn oḡ tuc a cḡr fuirḡne, acur nḡ aonaic ḡr an ḡt i, co nac fuil ḡḡt aḡn tḡian ḡr ḡalmair oḡ; ocuḡ nḡ cḡrḡ a cḡr fuirḡne an genn bḡ ḡg cḡr in cḡta, ocuḡ maḡrḡr fḡr ḡr an n-ḡt, ocuḡ flicḡ a tḡoigḡe innre, ocuḡ maḡrḡr co tḡg an brḡt".

from the bottoms of our rivers, and from the depths of our soil, LECT. XII.
 a weapon of which the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy The Stone weapon unmeaningly
 called a
 "Celt".
 contains a large collection.<sup>(207)</sup>

This stone weapon being of an oblong form, more or less flattened on two of its four sides, narrowed at one end, and sharpened at both ends, it required no more provision for conveniently carrying it than to nail a strap of leather by both its ends to the concavity of the shield, under which to thrust the stone by its narrow end; and there it safely and without inconvenience remained, on the march and even in the heat of battle, until the time for using it had arrived, when a single instant released it from its mooring, and sent it in its "rotary" course on its deadly mission.

The second effective requirement of the Champion's Hand-stone was a proper balance, and this our stone "celt" possesses in the highest degree; for, as every one knows, in hurling anything of a conical form from the hand, its power and velocity are greater by holding it by its smaller end than by the larger; and the blow of such a stone, so thrown, is much greater than that of one of which both ends are of the same thickness.

The third requirement was the edge at both ends; so that when either of them struck, the weapon was sure to leave its mark, and should it strike the face or head, was sure to enter, and with such force as easily to pass, as we are sometimes told it did, clearly through the skull from front to back.

That this particular half-flat half-round stone weapon may have been used in cases of necessity as an axe or chisel, in the absence of a better tool, is indeed more than probable; but I cannot at all agree with those who assert, (and I must add without the least authority), that for this purpose it was received into a slit handle, fastened with cement and cord, and that the more it was used the firmer it became fixed in its handle; whereas, the shortest trial would prove that the more such an axe was used the looser it would become, by the wood receding from the pressure of the blows. No, this "Champions' Hand-Stone", if used at all as an axe, must have been held naked in the hand.

There is, however, another description of stone "celt" (as modern theorists call them), much more flat and disproportioned at the ends, and this may have been used, or intended, chiefly as an axe, either to be set in a stick or held in the hand; but even if this be so, let me observe that nothing has been yet

<sup>(207)</sup> See Fig. 42; (No. 481, fig. 37, Catal. R.I.A.); this is of felstone, 5½ inches long, and about 2 broad. Fig. 43; (No. 13, fig. 54, R.I.A.); felstone, 13½ inches long, by 3½ broad.

LECT. XII. written to prove, or even to show any probability, that either of these kinds of stone implement was the rude creation of uncivilized man, in this or the neighbouring countries of Britain, or Scotland, or in Denmark.

Unfounded classification of M. Worsaae, and other Northern Antiquaries; their theory
of "the Stone, the Bronze, and the Iron periods".

I am led into these observations from circumstances that have occurred within a comparatively recent period, when opinions have been put forward, on assumed authority, to the effect that man in his uncivilized state had first recourse to weapons and tools of stone for offensive and domestic purposes, not having yet learned the art of the fusion and manufacture of metals, with which, however, he subsequently became gradually acquainted. On this assumption, the Society of Northern Antiquaries of Copenhagen were, I believe, the first who undertook the systematic classification of their great museum of national antiquities into three periods or classes, namely, "the Stone", the "Bronze", and the "Iron periods", assuming that each of these classes marked a distinct period and people in the history of their country.

M. Worsaae.

The first work in which I saw this theory propounded was a book written by an able northern antiquarian, Mr. J. J. A. Worsaae, in the year 1844, on the Primeval Antiquities of Denmark; and the following short extract from Thorn's English translation, (published in London in 1849), will be sufficient to show the whole drift of the original author, and of the learned society of which he is, I believe, a distinguished member.

"As soon as it was first pointed out", says Mr. Worsaae, "that the whole of these antiquities could by no means be referred to one and the same period, people began to see more clearly the difference between them. We are now enabled to pronounce with certainty that our antiquities belonging to the times of paganism" [which in Denmark, observe, came down to the tenth century], "may be referred to three chief classes, referable to three distinct periods. The first class includes all antiquarian objects formed of stone, respecting which we must assume that they appertain to the stone period, as it is called, that is, to a period when the use of metals was in a great measure unknown. The second class comprises the oldest metallic objects; these, however, were not as yet composed of iron, but of a peculiar mixture of metals,—copper and a small portion of tin melted together,—to which the name of 'bronze' has been given; from which circumstance the period in which this substance was commonly used has been named the bronze period. Finally, all objects appertaining to the period when iron was generally known and employed, are included in the third class, and belong to the iron period".

Such are the fundamental dogmas laid down by the northern antiquaries; dogmas laid down, I must say, without any reference whatever to historic or traditionary authority. LECT. XII.
M. WORSAAE.

Mr. Worsaae, however, is of opinion that the transition from the stone to the bronze period in Denmark, developed itself gradually, or step by step; but that the transition was so marked, that the bronze period must have commenced with the irruption of a new race of people, possessing a higher degree of cultivation than the early inhabitants. Mr. Worsaae then goes on to say (p. 24):

"As bronze tools and weapons spread over the land, the ancient inferior implements of stone and bone were, as a natural consequence, superseded. This change, however, was by no means so rapid as to enable us to maintain with certainty that from the beginning of the bronze period no stone implements were used in Denmark. The universal diffusion of metals could only take place by degrees, since in Denmark itself neither copper nor tin occurs, so that these metals being introduced from other countries, were of necessity expensive, the poorer classes continued for a long series of years to make use of stone as material; but it appears also that the richer, at all events in the earlier periods, in addition to their bronze implements, still used others of stone, particularly such as would have required a large quantity of metal for their formation. In tombs, therefore, which decidedly belong to the bronze period, we occasionally meet with wedges and axes, but most frequently hammers, all of stone, which must have been used at a much later period. A great number of these are very carefully bored through with round metal cylinders. But although implements of stone and bronze were at a certain period used together, yet it is an established fact [!] that a period first prevailed during which stone alone was used for implements and weapons; and that subsequently a time arrived when the axe of bronze appears to have been the all-prevailing custom".

These very plausible archaeological dogmas of the Northern Antiquaries were received with seeming satisfaction and perfect faith by, I believe, the far greater part of the antiquarians of Europe, but perhaps less generally in Dublin than anywhere else. The Northern Antiquaries were, however, greatly sustained in their opinions, if not primarily set in motion, by a communication made to the Royal Irish Academy on the 9th of January, 1843, by Mr. (now Sir Richard) Griffiths, chairman of the commissioners for improving the navigation of the Shannon, on the occasion of presenting to the Academy a large and important collection of weapons and other implements in

LECT. XII.

Sir R.
Griffiths.

stone, bronze, and iron, turned up when excavating the bed of the river, at the ancient ford of Keelogue.

After some observations on the situation of the Keelogue ford, as the chief pass from the counties of Clare and Galway into the county of Tipperary and the King's County, and the employment by the commissioners of contractors to carry out their plans, Sir Richard Griffiths proceeds:

"Towards deepening this ford the contractors dammed off a portion of the river one hundred feet in width, and seven hundred feet in length, and have commenced an excavation of nearly six feet in depth; the material to be excavated consisted at the top of two feet of gravel, loose stone, and sand, and at the bottom, of four feet of a mass composed of clay and rolled limestone, which, in some parts was found to be so solid and compact, that it became necessary to blast it with gunpowder, in preference to excavating, according to the ordinary system, through detrital matter. * * * * *

"I have already mentioned that the upper part of the excavation consisted of two feet of loose stones, gravel, and sand, and the lower part of four feet of a very compact mass, composed of indurated clay and rolled limestone. In excavating in the loose material of which the upper two feet was composed, the labourers found in the shallowest part of the ford a considerable number of ancient arms, consisting of bronze swords, spears, etc., in excellent preservation, which are similar to those which have been frequently discovered in other parts of Ireland; and towards the lower part of the upper two feet they discovered a great number of stone hatchets, also similar in many respects to those which have so frequently been met with in different parts of this country. In regard to the stone hatchets, I would merely observe, that the greater number, which are black, are composed of the silicious rock called Lydean stone, which occurs in thin beds, interstratified with the dark gray impure limestone called Calp, which is abundant in the neighbourhood of Keelogue and Banagher; but the others, some of which present a blueish gray, and some a yellowish colour, are composed of a sub-crystalline and apparently igneous porphyritic rock, none of which occurs in the neighbourhood, or possibly in the south of Ireland. Hence it is probable that the latter, which are much more perfectly executed than the black, or those composed of Lydean stone, were brought from a distance, and probably from a foreign country.

"The important and interesting subject for consideration in the antiquities before us is, that they are evidently the relics of very different and probably distant periods. Owing to the rapidity of the current at Keelogue ford, it is extraordinary that any comparatively recent deposit should have been formed, and at all events the annual increase must have been inconsiderable; hence, though not more than one foot of silty matter may be found between the stone weapons of a very remote age, and the swords and spears of another period still remote from us, yet under the circumstances described, centuries may have intervened between the periods of mortal strife which must have taken place in the river probably between the Leinstermen and Connaught men of old, disputing the passage of the river at two distinct, and, no doubt, very distant, periods".<sup>(208)</sup>

LECT. XII.
Sir R.
Griffiths.

This description of the discovery of the Keelogue antiquities would be much more interesting and valuable if Sir Richard Griffiths had given us his ideas as to the probable length of time which the condition of the ford would allow to expire for the formation of the one foot of loose stone and gravel which appears to have intervened between the metal and the stone weapons found in it. It would also be satisfactory if Sir Richard Griffiths, as well as other writers, could have set some probable limits to what they call "a very remote age", and "a period still remote from us". This, however, neither he nor any one else that I am aware of has attempted to do, so that we are left by them without any resting point in the history of man's existence from the beginning of the world down to almost our own times. There is a general belief (in Ireland at least) that with the introduction of Christianity into Ireland in the fifth century, the use of bronze as the material of military weapons and mechanical implements gave way to the more enduring and efficient materials of iron and steel. And assuming this probability as a guide, and supposing that the bronze weapons discovered in the Keelogue ford had been dropped there in the third century, and the stone weapons six hundred years before that, I should then be glad to know whether these two periods—both of them remote enough in our views—would in any way approximate to Sir Richard Griffiths' notion of "a very remote age", and of "a period still remote from us".

Vaguely, however, as Sir Richard Griffiths, Mr. Worsaae, and some other writers of a somewhat earlier period, have touched upon the times to which the stone and the bronze weapons might be referred, a gentleman not inferior at least to any of them, as a scholar, a philosopher, and an antiquarian, has within a recent period offered so strong and decided an opinion

LECT. XII. on the length of time which must have intervened between the deposits of the stone and the metal weapons in the Keelogue ford,—though still proposing no positive probable period for either,—that it is impossible to consider the effect of his observations without some degree of impatience, as well as regret. This opinion was expressed by the late lamented and truly learned John Mitchell Kemble, in an address on “the utility of antiquarian collections, as throwing light on the pre-historic annals of the European nations”, delivered by him before the Royal Irish Academy, February 9th, 1857. The following is the passage in Mr. Kemble’s Address in which he embodies the opinion to which I have alluded:

Mr. J. M.
Kemble.

“There is no doubt, gentlemen, that in the earliest ages of culture, weapons and implements are formed of the rudest materials accessible to man; that he is acquainted with wood, and horn, and stone, before he obtains a sufficient mastery over the metals to convert them to the purposes he desires; and, accordingly, we do find implements or weapons both of horn and stone, to the exclusion of the metals, at periods which the lessons of geology compel us to place at an almost infinite distance from our own. I would remind you of the operations of the commissioners for the improvement of the navigation of the Shannon. The men of science connected with that great undertaking will assure you that the lowest stratum bearing marks of human life contained implements of stone and horn so far below the first appearance of implements of metal as to imply an almost incalculable lapse of centuries between the two deposits”.

These are certainly high-sounding words and strong assertions, and assertions which, if true, it would be very difficult to bring within the range of man’s received creation; but, fortunately, they cannot be correct, since, according to the report of the Shannon commissioners themselves, the stone weapons found in the Keelogue ford were but a foot of “loose stones, gravel, and sand”, below the bronze weapons; and surely no one will believe that “an incalculable lapse of centuries” was required to produce this foot in depth of a deposit of “loose stones, gravel, and sand” in the mighty waters of the Shannon!

It appears, however, that Mr. Kemble acted on inaccurate and exaggerated information on this occasion; and as it was an assertion that was never believed by myself, I took occasion at the meeting of the Royal Irish Academy held on the 8th of February, 1858, to put the question to the president, the Reverend Dr. Todd, as to the authority on which Mr. Kemble’s statement was made. To this question Dr. Todd answered that Mr. Kemble’s observations were incorrect, and had in fact arisen from a mere mistake; and Dr. Wilde in addition said that he had lately waited on Sir Richard Griffiths and others of the Shannon commissioners, to ascertain if there had been any error in their communication to the Academy as to the facts of the case; that is, whether there was really but one foot of loose stuff between the bronze and the stone implements; and they all stated positively that there was not; and more, that there was no evidence whatever to show that they were not found mixed up together. I may remark, however, that this was the first time that Sir Richard Griffiths' and Mr. Kemble's error was publicly announced in the Academy.

And now I, for my part, question much whether even any appreciable period of time must, of necessity, have elapsed between the deposits of the stone and the metal implements found at Keelogue. If we consider the shape and weight of a cylindrical stone from four to six or seven inches long, and weighing from two to four pounds; and the shape as well as the weight of a spear from twelve to sixteen inches long, and weighing, independently of its long handle, two pounds; and the shape and weight of a sword twenty or twenty-six inches long, and weighing three pounds; and if we consider the extent of superficial surface which each of those implements covers, and the resistance to their sinking which that extent of surface presents,—particularly in a bed of “loose stones, gravel, and sand”, constantly undergoing disturbance from the current of water which flows over it;—if, I say, we consider all these circumstances, our wonder will not be that the shorter thicker more compact and heavier stones have gone down to a far greater depth than the lighter less compact and more lengthy implements of metal and timber, but that they have not gone to a much greater depth, which they certainly would if the same layer of “loose stones, gravel, and sand” had been deeper.<sup>(209)</sup> Whatever inferences or evidences, therefore, might reasonably be drawn from the fact of finding implements of stone and horn at lower depths than bronze or iron ones, in situations not liable to the disturbing influences of unequal resistance or natural or accidental pressure, no such deductions can, I think, be fairly drawn from the two deposits found in the Keelogue ford. And here I may add, that no implements of horn, such as Mr. Kemble speaks of, have been ever found in Ireland, as far as I am aware of.

The arms found at Keelogue
Ford.

To the same remote and indefinite antiquity as that given to the stone “Celts”, as these antiquarians insist on calling them,

Of the flint “arrowheads” found in Ireland.

<sup>(209)</sup> See, as to this question, INTRODUCTION.

LECT. XII.

are also referred the barbed flint "Arrow-Heads" so often met with above and below the surface of the land in Ireland; implements which have, however, I may observe, been found in greater quantities in the north than in any of the other parts of the country.

Why or how these generally beautifully and elaborately formed implements could be charged to man's incipient state of cultivation, I confess myself at a loss to understand. They appear to have been formed on the model of what we have described as the Trowel-shaped Spear of the Tuatha Dé Danann; the barb of the "arrow" commencing where the hip of the spear commences, sometimes forming a deep horse-shoe in the broad end of the "arrow", and leaving no tongue or shank to be received into the shaft;<sup>(210)</sup> in other instances a short shank between the barbs;<sup>(211)</sup> and in a third class neither barb nor shank, such as I have mentioned, but a continuation of the part behind the hips,<sup>(212)</sup> more or less extended and pointed, by which, if ever mounted, it was held in the slit end of the shaft.

It is to be noticed that the barbs are seldom, if ever, brought to a sharp point, and that in most cases, instead of splaying outwards, like the generality of arrows of the more modern times of the use of the bow and arrow, they are rounded inwards, so that if the tapering outlines were continued they would meet in an obtuse point at a short distance from the hips.

Bows and Arrows not alluded to in any of our ancient historic Tracts.

It is remarkable that in none of our more ancient historical or romantic tracts, is there any allusion whatever to Bows and Arrows; and what is more remarkable, indeed I might say what is more important, there is no model found for it among the other stone and metal weapons which have come down from the ancient times, either in Erin or any of the neighbouring countries. No barbed implement in ordinary stone or bronze has been yet discovered; nor has there been ever found in Erin, as far as we know, a flint arrow-head in company with any one or more bronze spears, darts, or swords.

It is quite clear that if the barbed arrow had been known to the Firbolgs and the Tuatha Dé Danann at the battle of Magh Tuireadh, they would have used it; and we would undoubtedly have specimens of it among the immense number of their other LECT. XII.

<sup>(210)</sup> [See Figs. 44, 45, and 46; (Figs. 10, 12, 13, Nos. 514, 552, 584, R.I.A.), same size as originals.]

<sup>(211)</sup> [See Figs. 47, 48, 49, 50, and 51; (Figs. 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, Nos. 611, 658, 657, 716, 724, Cat. R.I.A.), same size as originals.]

<sup>(212)</sup> [See Figs. 52 and 53; (Figs. 22, 27, Nos. 771, 954, Cat. R.I.A.), same size as originals. The last is of large size, but all the smaller heads are just as likely to have belonged to the small casting-spears which we know were used (as in the combat between Cuchulainn and Ferdiaidh in the Táin Bó Chualigne), as to "arrows", of which we have no record.]

bronze weapons which have certainly come down to our times; and not only that, but its efficiency and convenience, I should say, would be so obvious to their successors in all after ages, that (from its peculiar liability to be lost when once shot) in place of its total non-existence in metal, thousands of bronze arrow-heads would long ere this have been picked up in all parts of Ireland.

Resting on these reasons, then,—reasons drawn from a history not yet overthrown, nor likely to be,—I have come to the conclusion that the barbed “arrow”-head is not, in Ireland at least, a weapon to be referred to man’s uncultivated state, but a new weapon either devised or brought into Ireland within her undoubted historic period, and manufactured, whether here, or wherever else, by a people who had been well acquainted with the best types of the metallic spears.

Finding flint and bronze spears and “arrows” in the same spot, or in the same grave, in Denmark or in Britain, cannot shake the opinions that I have put forward; since it is, I believe, well known that the general use of brass or bronze came down to a much later period in those countries, especially the first, than in Ireland. I have yet, however, something more to say here, both as to the Champion’s Hand-Stone, and the first probable introduction of the barbed “arrow”-head into this country.

LECTURE XIII.

[Delivered 6th June, 1856.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE; (continued). Of the arms used at the Battle of Aenach Tuaghé, B.C. 160; temp. Congal Cláiringnech, (Monarch, B.C. 161). Of the use of "Round Stones" in battle. Story of Congal Cláiringnech. Use of the "Champion's Hand-Stone" by Fergus Mac Róigh. Of the use of stone missiles in general. Use of the "Champion's Hand-Stone" at the Siege of Drom Damhghaire, (A.D. 270.) Use of it by Find Mac Cumhaill. Description of the form of his Hand-Stone. Story of Prince Eochaidh, son of Enna Cennselach (circa A.D. 400); and of the death of Niall "of the Nine Hostages" by an Arrow, A.D. 405. Of the Sling, and Sling-Stone, in ancient Erin. The Caer Chlis, or Sling-Stone, at the Second Battle of Magh Tuir-eadh. Of the story of Duibh-linn. Death of queen Medbh, by a Sling-Stone. Shape of the Sling-Stone. Use of Sling-balls of Iron, and Bronze. Use of the Sling by Cuchulainn. Of the Tuball. Of the Crann-Tabhail. Of the Deil-Chis. Of the Tailm.

THE next reference to stone weapons belongs to a period shortly anterior to the battle of Ath Comair, described in the last lecture, and should have taken precedence of that battle, but that the coincidence of the broad Gaulish spears, of which we had been previously speaking, and the Lia Lamha Láich or Champion's Hand-Stone happening to be mentioned together in that tract, induced me, at the expense of a trilling anachronism, to let that transaction take precedence.

Of Congal Cláiringnech: (Monarch B.C. 161.)

The monarch Eochaidh Feidlech, the principal personage mentioned in the battle of Ath Comair, assumed the monarchy B.C. 111, according to the Annals of the Four Masters; while Congal Cláiringnech, of whom I am now to speak, had become monarch B.C. 161, or forty-one years before Eochaidh.

This Congal Cláiringnech was the son of Rudhraighé, a former monarch; but three kings in succession had intervened between the reigns of the father and the son. Of these three the last was Lughaidh Luaighné, who, when he came to the throne, gave the provincial kingship of Ulster to the prince Fergus Mac Leíté, to the prejudice of Congal Cláiringnech, the son of the former monarch, and hereditary king of Ulster. Congal in revenge for this affront and wrong headed a large body of personal followers consisting of displeased or disaffected men from different parts of the country, and on his way home from Tara, after an adverse decision had been given against his claim, having met the son of the monarch, Lughaidh Luaighné, he slew him, together with the chief part of his attendants; and then, after ravaging and devastating his native province, looking for a secure defensive position, he marched with his followers to a place called Aenach Tuaiǵhé, at the mouth of the river Bann. Here he took up as strong a post as circumstances would allow him, and awaited the issue. He had not long to wait; he was speedily overtaken, and challenged to battle by Fergus Mac Leithé. A battle accordingly took place; and though Congal was victorious, he deemed it prudent to leave the country, and to wait for a more favourable time to assert his right to the sovereignty of his native province.

The following short passage from the ancient historical account of the Battle of Aenach Tuaiǵhé gives us the names of the weapons which the combatants used on the occasion:

Arms used in the Battle of Aenach Tuaiǵhé;
(B. C. 160.)

"And then both parties of them advanced upon each other with long blue darts, and with sharp, bloody spears, and with round [or globular] stones; after which they had recourse to their thrusting and striking weapons, until slaughtered hosts had fallen there".<sup>(213)</sup>

In this passage we have nothing new as regards weapons except the reference to "globular stones"; save that the long "blue" darts may argue an iron and not a bronze material in that weapon. On this last matter I have but one remark to offer; namely, that the word gorm, which I translate "blue", means a colour certain shades of which so nearly approach the green called glas, that the word might possibly be applied to a weapon of that tint. It is possible, however, that the use of iron had either been discovered or introduced into Erin at this time, as we certainly find frequent reference to it shortly after the same period, in the Tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgné; though not to the exclusion of bronze, as we shall see by-and-by.

The reference to the general use of round stones in this battle is curious indeed; but the round stone must not be taken to be the same as the Lia Lamha Laich or "Champion's Hand-Stone"; for the latter weapon was apparently always reserved for some particular occasion, or opportunity of a more important character, in some difficult contest of skill; while the round stones are here represented as having been cast promiscuously with the darts and spears, on the advance of both parties to the close combat in which their "long heavy spears", and their "broad green spears" for thrusting, and their swords for cleaving, were called into requisition.

Of the use of "round stones" in battle.

(213) original:—ir annrín no innraíḡ cáč a éčile síb no foíḡóib íotḡormá, ácar'no ḡáib faebnačá, fuileáča, ocuḡ no élačarb cnumne; ocuḡ no éuačar íar íín ár na h-áymaíb íomḡona, ocuḡ íombuaileč, co nooḡé íuačar tíuḡ-ár na íluaḡ.

LECT. XIII.

It is remarkable that in no details of any battle before or after this Battle of Aenach Tuaiǵhé is there any reference to "showers" of stones such as we have here, down to the battle fought near Limerick by the celebrated Ceallachan Caisil, against the Dances, so late as about the year 920, in which it is stated (Book of Lismore) that "their youths, their champions, and their proud, haughty veterans, came to the front of the battle to cast their stones and their small arrows (or darts) and their smooth spears, on each side, at one another".<sup>(214)</sup>

Story of Congal
Cláiringnech.

To return to Congal Cláiringnech: After the Battle of Aenach Tuaiǵhé, he passed, with a band of followers, into Scandinavia, and took military service from the king of that country; but here, as always in the adventures of the brave, a curious bit of romance is introduced into the narrative. The king of Scandinavia, or Lochlainn, had a beautiful daughter, who of course fell in love with the exiled Ultonian prince; but as he had no gifts or dowry to bestow on her, according to the custom of her own country, he declined her hand until he should obtain by his valour some precious object, such as she should point out to him. So she requested of him to obtain for her the three beautiful birds which perched on the shoulders and neck of the amazon Saighead, the daughter of Carrtunn Cor, the chief guardian of the castle of the amazon Muirn Mollbhach. Congal and his party accordingly set out by sea to reach this famous castle, which was situated on the eastern shore of a land called in the story "the cold country", (probably Iceland,) which in time they reached.

When they approached the fortress and landed upon the strand, Saighead came out to meet them; but as she came near them, her three beautiful birds began to sing so enchantingly, with such plaintive and soothing tones, that Congal and all his people, who heard it, fell insensibly into a deep sleep, excepting Fergus Mac Róigh alone. And the following passage from the old tale tells how Fergus escaped the potent spell:

Use of the
"Champion's Hand-Stone" by Fergus Mac
Róigh.

"In short, sleep fell on them all except Fergus alone. And what saved him from sleep was this: he plucked the gold brooch which was in his cloak out of it, and he began to pierce his feet, his fingers, and his palms with it; and looking about, and seeing all the people asleep, it became certain to him that what their Druid foretold of their expedition was about to be fulfilled; whereupon, he put his hand into the hollow boss of his

(214) original: "do mactabair a n-oid, acar a n-eyro, acar a n-aer anfeis, popuallach a núnorac na hirgaile, do caitem a cloé acar a cael-roigset acar a coinn-rléig na gac leir.—(B. of Lismore, fol. 149 a.)

shield, and drew forth from it a Leacán Laoich Milidh, [that is, LECT. XIII. a 'Champion-Warrior's semi-flat Stone'], which he threw with brave and manly force; and it struck the hag on the front of her skull, through which it entered, and carried with it its own measure of her black face and brain out through the back of her head, so that the hag fell dead in the middle of the strand".<sup>(215)</sup>

Here then is a description of the "Champion's Hand-Stone", so particular that no one can mistake its form. It was leacán, that is a "half" or modified "flat stone"; for leac means a perfectly flat stone, so that leacán must mean a stone partaking somewhat of the flat form, but not entirely flat; and, than this, no more accurate description need be desired of those stone implements in our museums which it has been the unmeaning fashion to call "celts".

It will have been observed too, that like the prince Lothar and his men at the Battle of Ath Comair, described in the last lecture, Fergus had his leacán hid away in the hollow of his shield, in reserve for some important feat of valour and victory; and that, therefore, it could not have been an ordinary stone picked up for the occasion; nor, on the other hand, one of those "round" stones which were used generally by both parties, at the battle of Aenach Tuaghé.

So far I have been speaking of military and offensive weapons in the chronological order in which they happen to be mentioned, in such ancient Irish documents as have come under my notice; but as the subject of scientific stone missiles has been introduced, it is one that would suffer by dispersion; and I shall, therefore, add here the few other references to them which I have been able to collect, in chronological succession as regards themselves, though I shall have to return again in order to take up the remaining metal weapons in their proper chronological order.

My reason for dwelling so much and so particularly on these stone weapons is, to show by all the evidences within my reach, that the Lia Láimha Láich, or Champion's Hand-Stone, or by whatever other name it was designated by different writers, was not an ordinary chance stone which a man may pick up any-

Of the use of missiles of stone in ancient Erin.

<sup>(215)</sup> original:—Cio tpa, ádt do tuit a coollao uile oppa, ádt feargur a aenar; acur aread tuc uorun gan coollao ebon, tug an dealg úir do baol ina brat ar, acur do gab ag gum a éroigeo acur a thép, acur a deannano oe. Ocur do féé tairur ocur do connairc an fluarz uile ina coollao, ba veim lair go tiuepad fairtime an Uruad uóib, ocur tuc a lám a cobpad a réctih, ocur tuc leacán laoié milio ar, ocur tuc upéar repoa repamail oe go tapla a ctul a cnuad éinn uon éallig, go núc a corbeir u'innéim a uoidéam éné na ceann riap reáctair, gur tuit an éalléac ar lár na tréga.

LECT. XIII. where, but a stone of a particular shape, and to be used not for chance or random shots but for a precise aim, and for some important object.

The next reference to this Champion's Hand-Stone which I find is one that contains some legendary details of druidic interest, and touching which the story though invested with too much of the marvellous to be credible as history is still quite legitimate and in point as regards the evidence which it is my present object to draw from it.

Of the
"Champion's
Hand-stone"
at the Siege
of Drom Damhghairé,
(A.D. 270.)

It will be remembered that in two former lectures I addressed myself to the subject of Druids and Druidism in ancient Erinn. One of these lectures<sup>(216)</sup> was chiefly devoted to the wonderful feats of the Druid Mogh Ruith, at the siege of Drom Damhghairé, in Munster; and the reference to the Lia Lamha to which I am now about to call your attention occurs in the ancient account of this siege.

The battle was fought between Cormac Mac Airt (who reigned as monarch of Érin from A.D. 227 to 266), and Fiacha Muillethan, king of Munster, who had refused the unjust demands of the chief king for a double tribute on the pretence that Munster included two kingdoms in one. The hill of Drom Damhghairé is that now called Knocklong, situated in the south-east corner of the county of Limerick; and it was on this hill that Cormac pitched his camp, from which circumstance indeed its present name is derived.

Powerful as Cormac's army was, he had, it would seem, still more confidence in the magical power of his druids, of whom a good many of the most celebrated attended him; and according to the singular tract from which I quote, the exercise of their power soon made the Munstermen feel that they in their turn must have recourse to superhuman agency to counteract influences so baleful, since all their natural efforts had failed to do so. It was on this account that, according to the story, they sent an urgent message with offers of large and substantial gifts to the old Druid Mogh Ruith, (who then resided in Oilen Dairbré, now the well-known island of Valencia, on the coast of Kerry), begging of him to come to their assistance. The druid complied; and he had no sooner arrived at the scene of action than he made the monarch's druids feel themselves in the presence of a superior power.

King Cormac himself, we are told, soon perceived the weakness of his druids, and reproached them sharply for it; upon which Colptha, one of the chiefest among them, arms himself,

(216) Lect. x.; ante, p. 212.

and goes forth to the ford which lay between the two armies, for the purpose of giving single combat. Mogh Ruith, who was blind, is told this, whereupon he calls up his pupil and companion, Ceanmhor, and orders him to go to meet the druid Colptha, at the ford, and give him combat.

LECT. XIII.
Of the
"Champion's
Hand-Stone"
at the Siege
of Drom Damhghatré.
(A.D. 270.)

Then Mogh Ruith says to Ceanmhor :

"Let me have my poison-stone and my Lia Láimhé, and my 'victory over an hundred', and my 'destruction upon my foes'. And the stone was given to him; and he began to praise it; and putting poisonous charms into it, he pronounced the following address to it:

"I besecch my Lec Láimhé, [Hand-Stone]—
That it be not a flying shadow;
Be it a brand to rout the foes,
Before the brave host of Clairé, [Munster].

"My fiery hard stone,—
Be it a red water-snake;—
Woe to him around whom it coils, Betwixt the swelling waves.

"Be it a sea eel, like a seal,—
As long as seven ox-horns;
Be it a vulture among vultures,
Which shall separate body from soul.

"Be it an adder of nine coils,
Around the body of gigantic Colptha,—
From the ground into his head,
The smooth spear-headed reptile.

"The spear-armed, royal, stout wheel
Shall be as a galling, strong, thorny briar;
Woe is he around whom it shall come,
My fiery, stout, powerful dragon.

"Nobles and authors shall relate
The woe of those whom it shall reach;
The high valour of Colptha and of Lurga
It shall dash against the rocks.

"The prostrate one which it prostrates,
In bonds shall it bind;
The bonds which it binds on,
Arc like the honey-suckle round the tree.

"Their ravages shall be checked;
Their deeds shall be made to fail;
Their bodies shall be food for wolves;
At the great ford of slaughter.

"So that children might bear away,
Without combat and without conflict,

LECT. XIII.

Of the
"Champion's
Hand-Stone"
at the Siege
of Drom
Damhghairé.

Their trophies and their heads,

If such were what they sought. [I beseech.<sup>(217)</sup>

It will, I think, be pretty clear to everyone that the subject of this extraordinary poetic address was no ordinary stone, nor one that had not on previous occasions given proof that the deeds which it was invoked to perform on this occasion were not to be sought from it in vain. And so it happened: for when the druid Ceannmhór, Mogh Ruith's favourite pupil and companion, comes to the ford of combat to meet Colptha, Cor-mac's chief druid, hand to hand,—and when the fight is at its height between them, and Ceannmhór is getting the worse of it,—he suddenly pulls out the stone, and casts it into the stream where they fought; and, according to this strange story, no sooner did the enchanted stone touch the water than it was changed into a monstrous snaky eel, which, coiling round the legs and body of the Druid Colptha, brought him prostrate to the ground, and there detained him fast until Ceannmhór cut off his head, and returned himself in triumph to his old tutor and friends.

On the following day, according to this tale, Ceannmhór was again challenged to the combat by Lurga, another of king Cor-mac's chief druids; and they repaired to the same ford as on the previous day, as the story says:

"Ceannmhór went towards the ford with his flattened stone in his hand; and he began to praise it, and to implore, and to foretell the slaughter which it would perform; and he invoked his gods, and the chief druid of the world, namely, Mogh Ruith; and he said:

(217) original:—Dom poicheo mo éloé neithe, ocur mo lia lánthe, ocur mo éolann céit, ocur mo vichugaó ar mo naimioiu. Acur tucad só, ocur po bóí íca molaó, ocur ag cur breaceta neithe innce, ocur oo páiré in peitoirec ro:

áilim mo líe lánthe,
napab caróbrí caróí,
bró breo bhrífeas báirí
ne cat cróda Clairí.
Mo éloé teimnteas ceann
bró naéair veas vobair maing gur a bríllíó a foruim
íter éonnuib tpeall.
Dro muirfeacais, mulaé,
foó réct congra rósaíth,
bró baódb roer baóbaib
rceapay corp ne hanmain.
Dro naéair noi rnaóma um éorp Cholpa allmaí,
o éalam co a ceann
an dóic pleathain bhriceann.
In not iuibneac iugteann
bró uirí agairb imíteann,

maing a ticpa timceall
mo tpaic éairpceas ceann.
Canraic uair ír augtaí
maing co a ríneas,
arogail oo colpta ír oo lurga
laíró ear fo all.
In tparcraó nor tparcraínn
ír faroao nor faroann
ír nareao nor nareain
mar bír féit im éhann.
Coirpíreap a brogail
meatparíreap a monar, beic a cuirp fa conaib
ar at olaíar áir.
Comberwaí leo leanaib
cín tpoit ír cín veabard
a corcap ne a ceannaib cemad ead buó áil. [áilim.

- "A flat stone, a flat stone;
 A stone that will kill as before;
 A narrow stone, a thick thin stone;
 A choice weapon for success.
 "A stone that will cut, a stone that will cut,
 Over well secured shields;
 A stone that will spring over waves,
 Without stooping or curving.
 "As thou hast overpowered in the contest,
 By hardy valour, Colptha;
 Go forth strongly in fierce action,
 Until by thee shall Lurga fall.
 "A valuable stone, a precious stone,
 A guardian stone, a thunderbolt stone,
 A powerful stone, an accurate stone,
 An expedition stone, a victorious stone.
 "Ethor's stone, Daniel's stone,
 A hard stone, a battle stone;
Mogh [Ruith]'s stone, Simon's stone,
 An immense stone, a swift stone.
 "A stone to relieve the fears of Munstermen,
 A stone ready to fly without command,
 A stone of power, a stone of death,
 A noisy stone, a silent stone.
 "A stone that will fill the ford
 Into sweeping-torrent dimensions,
 A stone that will distribute the full flood
 Over fields and over banks.
 "A stone that will quickly overpower,
 This horse-boy that seeks me;
 A stone that will defeat the focs,
 A stone that will scatter them is my stone". (218)

(218) original:—Fabair Ceannhair fop amur an áda, acur a lia cloíde 'na laith, acur fabair ica molaó acur ica h-easpaigíre, acur ic fairsíne in áir do dénaó, acur teit i muingin a dée acur pium ónuab in uothain, eodon, Mog Ruith, acur do paro:

lia cloíde, lia cloíde,
clóe éana gun béba,
lia éael, lia tiug, tana,
arri toga fop méla. lia fillpear, lia fillpear,
tap pcealla gu nallaó;
lia lingpear tap tonna
gan epoma gan camaó. mar do epaeair in argam
epia fupogail epuaro, Colpta,
epus go calcair epia bonpparó
gnim
co nppocair oir lurga.

lia lóga, lia lóghar,
lia coma, lia luaða,
lia bpiða, lia beaeta,
lia paeata, lia buada.
lia eéóp, lia dhaincol,
lia éalao, lia cata;
lia mhoga, lia Shimoin,
lia oimóp, lia oata. lia foippear báig miumneac,
lia liometa gan aplat,
lia éuingin, lia cuipmim,
lia énútae, lia éartae.

LECT. XIII.

Of the
 "Champion's
 Hand Stone"
 at the Siege
 of Drom
Damhghairé.

LECT. XIII.

Of the
"Champion's
Hand-Stone"
at the battle
of Drom
Damhghairé.

This singular poem, as well as that which precedes it, notwithstanding its exaggerated style, must be received as clearly describing the Lia Lamha Láich, or Champion's Hand-stone.

Even though there were no closer description than this: that it was, by the Arch-Druid's incantations, to be changed into a poisonous eel or water-snake, on touching the water, this alone implies plainly enough that its shape must have been oblong; but the first verse of the druid Ceannmhair's address leaves no doubt whatever on the matter.

"A flat stone, a flat stone;

A stone that will kill as before;

A narrow stone, a thick thin stone,

A choice weapon for success".

Surely no attempt with plain words could more accurately describe the stone of which the drawing is an exact model, than these words of this ancient and most wonder-loving poet, whoever he may have been.

It is needless to say that the stone so highly praised and so fervently invoked performed in the story all that was expected from it; it not only crushed the northern druid Lurg to death, but in its shape of a monstrous eel, with a long flowing fiery mane, it flung itself upon the dry land, and pursued Cairbré Liffeachair, king Cormac's son, who had been present at the combat, in the direction of his camp, and would have annihilated him also, if Ceannmhair had not again addressed it in soothing words, by which its fury was calmed; and then he led it back to its old blind owner, who immediately restored it to its original form of a Champion's Hand-Stone!

The fifth stanza of this last poem requires some explanation if we could give it,—which we unfortunately cannot, except in a single instance: It runs thus:—

"Ethor's stone, Daniel's stone,

A hard stone, a battle stone,

Mogh [Ruith]'s stone, Simon's stone,

An immense stone, a swift stone.

We know very well, of course, who Mogh Ruith, our own great druid was; and we also know that the "Simon" mentioned was Simon Magus, under whom Mogh had, it was said, finished his druidic education; but we do not know who Ethor and Daniel were, save that they too must have been some well known ancient Eastern professors of the magic art, from whom

Lia linpar na h-áta,
in áro deilb fuataig;
Lia rannfear in lán crruit
cap bánta cap brúada.

Lia traetfear go raparo
in eachlaé nomtiallra;
Lia fuaenfar ar namuib,
Lia marófear, mo liara.

our Irish druid appears to have taken lessons. And one reason for my referring to their names a second time is, in the hope that some of the learned better acquainted than myself with classical mythology, with mediæval history, and with eastern lore, may happen to know something about these personages, and kindly communicate it to me.

The next "Champion's Hand-Stone" that I have any note of, is one with which the name of our long celebrated fellow-countryman, Fínd Mac Cumhaill is connected. The history of this stone is preserved in the ancient topographical tract called Dinnseanchas, in an article on the origin of the name Ath Liag Fínd, or the Ford of Finn's Liag, or "flat stone"; (now the ford of Ballyleague, at Lanesborough, on the Shannon above Athlone). The story is given in prose and verse, as follows:

"Ath-liag Fínd, why is it so called? Answer: A battle which was fought there between Fínd Mac Cumhaill and Iland the son of Eochaidh Abrad-Ruaidh; and it was at this precise time that Sideng, the daughter of Mongan of the fairy hills, came with a flat stone (lic) and a chain of gold to Fínd, who gave them into the hand of Guairé Guill, [a familiar name for Óisín, the celebrated son of Fínd]. Fínd having used up all his weapons in the battle, snatched the stone [from Óisín], and with it killed three other sons of Eochaidh Abrad-Ruaidh, namely, Bran, Seanach, and Senan. And the stone fell into the ford; and no one shall find it until it is found by Bøthuinde, [the nymph of the waves], the daughter of Calad son of Concinn, who will bring it to land on a Sunday morning; and there will be but seven years from that to the morning of the day of judgment; and hence the ford is called Ath Liag Fínd".

[This is the prose account; and the verse scarcely differs from it, except in one important fact—the form of the stone:]

"Ath-liag Fínd, what stone is it named from?

Ascertain for us, O ye historians;

What was it that darkened his [Fínd's] memory,

At the time that he forgot his stone there?

"A victorious battle of high renown

Here was won by Mac Cumhaill,

Over a hero of the northern country,

The son of Eochaidh Abrad-Ruaidh.

"At this very time came Seigeng [Sideng] the fair,

Daughter of noble Mongan of the fairy hills,

And gave a stone, with a chain of gold,

To the son of Cumhall son of Tliren-mór [Trenmhor].

"Fínd now placed his missive stone,

In the battle, on the back of Guairé Guill,

Of the
"Champion's Hand-Stone" of
*Fínd Mac
Cumhaill*.

LECT. XIII.

Of the
"Champion's Hand-Stone" of
Fínd Mac
Cumhall.

- Until all his weapons at length had failed,
Between the rising day and the close of evening.
"A shout then reached them from the north,
It was Fland, the son of Eochaidh Abrad-Ruaidh;
His face distorted with mighty rage,
The valiant chief of the furious combat.
"Fínd forthwith put forth his hand
For the stone of three angles and of three sides,
And that which was placed upon the back
Of Guaire Gull he bravely threw.
"By this he felled into the ford
Four Conalls, and four Colmans,
Four Suibhnés, two Mac Bries,
Four Dubhthachs, two Diarmaids.
"Fínd his stone cast into the ford,
Now that his heroic rage had risen;
And Bran, and Senach, and Seanan,
By that cast together were slain.
"The stone was lost, amid the waters,—
That stone by which Fínd's honour was saved,—
And from thence thither no one has found it, Though truly it was a precious jewel.
"But it will be found by a gifted maiden,
Whose name will be Bethuindé,
Who shall thrust her fair right foot,
Through its connecting link of red gold.
"Up to land will she then bring
This stone by its attached hook;
And she will leave it on the strand,
On a Sunday in the latter days.
"Seven years from that auspicious day,
Until the day of judgment comes;—
And such is the deed from which arose
The ancient name of this famous ford".<sup>(219)</sup>

(219) original:—adhlíag fíno canar go hainmnigeo. ní hannfiam fín:
cach do padoa itir fhíno mac Cumail acur flano mac Echach abpa-
nuaro, cono annfín do reacht Sioeng ingen Mongain ríob co lig co flabpa oir do fíno mac Cumail co tapo fín a laim Suairé Suill. Co
taipne airm fhíno do chathim, cono iapam, taiplig [caplaic a linc]
co torcpadap de tui mic Echach abpaonuaro. i. bpan acur Seanach acur
Senan, acur torcpair in liag ir an ath, acur ní padoaib [foppagaib] nech conar bechuill [beuindé] ingen Chatao mic Concino, cono hi dom- beir ar aip maoin domnaig, acur reacht iapam co bpaich; unoe ath liag:

adhlíag fíno ca lia via cá
finuaro uimio a [na] fencáda ciara cumne po our vail [cia
via annne po don vail],
can foppacaib a lig ano.

imairneac chata cem nglé,
do mac Cumail almaine
fop milig don leich aduaro
fíu mac Echach abpaonuaro.

In more than one point of view this is a most curious and valuable legend. It clearly and distinctly shows us, not only that stones such as our stone "celts", (as modern "antiquarians" call them), were used in battle within historical times; but also that such stones, formed perhaps after a particular fashion, were deemed worthy presents from fair ladies to brave champions.

The stone in this legend appears not only to have had three angles or edges, and three sides, but to have been perforated at the smaller end, and suspended by a chain and hook of gold; but whether this implies that the stone was not to be thrown from the hand, but swung round and struck with by the chain, we have nothing now to show, as far as I am aware of.

One instance more of the use of the Champion's Hand-Stone is all that I shall cite at present; and it is the latest to which I have found any particular historical reference.

The celebrated Niall "of the Nine Hostages" was monarch of Erin from A.D. 379 to 405. Among the hostages whom he carried with him to Teamair, from the provincial kings, and kept prisoners as security for their fealty, was Eochaidh, the son of Enna Cinnsealach, King of Leinster. Discontented with his captivity Eochaidh after some time succeeded in making his escape, and took his way southwards, in the direction of his own

LECT. XIII.

Description
of the form of the Stone in the Story of Enna.Story of Prince
Eochaidh
son of Enna
Cinnsealach.
(circa A.D.
400.)

Do luro Seigeng rel iarrin ingen Mongáin ráin ptoais, co tuc lic co flabpaio nóir do mac Cumail meic Clipen móir.

Air do pao fino a lic luino
rin chach for muin Suairi gluino [guill],
co cairnic airmio in clois [airmíeo a flois],
o thpach epgi co hiarnoin.

Sairir ir in [arin oin], leath actuao [ar in leth actuao], flano mac Echach abpaopuaro no papt a cruth comall ngle then [the in] coinchino na higaile [hynlaige].

Sinro fino a lam iar rin don lig treuill the eochair co tuc in cenn bai for bail [muin]

Suairi Suill for eblongair [forpoeblongair].
dopochpaio rin ran ath
ceithri Conaill, oa Cholmain, ceithri Suibni, oa Mac Dmíc, ceithri Dubthaigi oa Diarmuid.
Tairplaig Finn a lia ran ath on uair thamic annrech cách [alonn lat],

Urban ocup Senac na [ir] Sea-
nan

ar de rin do poehpaioar.

Do poehair in lia rin linn via noeapmao enech rial fino iapam nocho navaib [nagaib
.i. nragaib] nech
conache [conao] in reo romaineach.

Pogeb ingen comall ngle
vianao comamm bechuinoe, pocheapo acar [acoir] liapao
choir

the na hupolomar noeargoir.
Como tairping [tairpingeo] ruar
iar rin

in lia rin cona opolaim [opolaib]

conro farcaib ir in [for a] cpao

via dommao irin tiugnair.

Seache mbiaona uao rapao ngle,

co tic laithi in meppaite
conro he rin gnim via tá vinoferchur in nachara [veg ata]. [at.

—[MS. H. 3. 3. T.C.D. 53, and Lecain, 251, a, b.]

LECT. XIII.

Story of Prince
Eochaidh, son of Eanna
Cennselach, (circa A.D.
400.)

country. Hungry and exhausted during his journey, however, he could think of no better step than that of calling at the house of Laidcend, son of Barced, who was one of the monarch Niall's chief poets, in order to obtain some food; but it was refused him, and he was obliged to pursue his way. He did not forget the inhospitality; and returning from the south soon afterwards with a party of followers, he burned the poet's house, and in the attack upon it killed his only son.

The poet after this continued for a whole year to write satires against the men of Leinster, and to urge the monarch to avenge his personal wrongs as those of the whole order to which he belonged, which was by law privileged against personal "violation". Niall at last complied with his entreaties, and marching with a large force into Leinster encamped at Tulach O'Felmédha, (now Tullow, in the county of Carlow), laying waste the country all round, until the men of Leinster were compelled to deliver their young prince Eochaidh once more into his hands. The poet now prepared for vengeance; and at his instigation the young prince, we are told, had a chain put round his neck, the end of which was passed through a perforated "upright flag-stone", and made fast by an iron bar at the back. The prince had not been long in this condition when a party of nine men went out from the camp to kill him; but when he perceived their design, he gave, says the historian, a sudden twist and tug at the chain, which broke it; and seizing the iron bar with which it had been fastened to the stone, he plied it so bravely that his nine assailants fled before him to Tullow. The Lagenians, who were encamped near, seeing him once more at liberty, pressed on along with him into King Niall's camp, which they suddenly entered, spreading confusion and slaughter on all sides; and the Chief King himself was forced to fly northwards and to quit the province with all his speed.

Niall, however, soon afterwards went to the south again, and overrunning the whole province did not stop until he encamped on the shore of the bay of Wexford, on the brink of the river Slaney. The poet Laidcend, who accompanied him on this expedition, then begged of him to spare the country and the people; but he besought him to order the young prince, Eochaidh, to come into the poet's presence, at the opposite side of the river Slaney. The prince consented, and immediately the poet had him deprived of his arms, and then began to reproach and abuse him bitterly. Whilst thus engaged, however, the noble youth, we are told, suddenly drew from his girdle a "liic curad", or Champion's flat Stone, which he threw at him; and the stone struck him in the forehead, and killed him on the spot.

It was on this occasion that the Poet Ua Torta, who had been LECT. XIII. Laidcend's pupil, commemorated the sad fate of his tutor in the following stanza:—

“A champion's hand-stone by a fool was cast,
Over the saltwater eastwards;
It was Eochaidh son of Enda that threw it,
At Laidcend the son of Barced.<sup>(220)</sup>”

After this unfortunate deed, (for a Poet was always privileged against all violence, whatever the provocation), Eochaidh fled into Scotland, and sought and received protection, concealment, and hospitality from Loarn, the king of that country.

King Niall returned home; and some time after this it was that collecting a large force of the men of Erin and of Scotland he proceeded at their head on his last expedition, into France, with the intention of taking “the hostages of Italy”; and he stopped, says the history, only when he reached the banks of the Loire, “near the foot of the Alps”, where he encamped. Of the Death of Niall “of the Nine Hostages”, by an arrow, A.D. 505.

Now the young prince Eochaidh marched with this expedition in the train of the king of Scotland, but in disguise; and while Niall one day sat conspicuously on an eminence, on the bank of the river, taking counsel with his officers, he passed to the opposite side unobserved, and shot the king dead with an arrow (saiget), from his fidbac, (or bow); after which he fled, and succeeded in reaching his own country of Leinster in safety.

This short article is valuable for two reasons; the first that it shews that even down to shortly before the year 405, in which year Niall was killed, the Lia Láimha, or Champion's Hand-stone, remained in use in Erin; and secondly, because it contains the earliest reference to the Bow and Arrow that I have ever met with in Irish writings. It is quite possible, however, that later reference to the use of the Champion's Hand-Stone, and earlier to the Bow and Arrow, than those that I have noticed here, may be to be found in old Irish books still extant; I can only say that they have not come under my observation.

To these few notices of the offensive use of the Champion's Hand-Stone, I shall now add a few brief notices of the Sling and Sling-Stone in ancient times. I have to remark, however, that in no instance have I ever met with any account of the general use of the Sling, in battle; it seems that, like the champion's hand-stone, they were always used on certain special occasions, Of the Sling and Sling-Stone in ancient Erin.

<sup>(220)</sup> original, (MS. T.C.D.; H. 2. 16, fol. 784;—B. of Ballymote, fol. 77. b.):
Lia láimhe, opuē póneir, Eochaid mac Enda porla
oap ran rál saeicha, por taroceno mac barceda.

LECT. XIII. where no other weapon would reach the object sought to be assailed.

At the second Battle of Magh Tuireadh.

The first reference to the Sling-Stone, but in this case without the Sling itself, is in the second battle of Magh Tuireadh, where, as has been shown in a former lecture, the Tuatha De Danann champion, Lug, struck the Fomorian champion, Balor "of the stout blows", in his "evil eye", and drove it into his skull. It is not, as I have already said, stated in the tract on the battle of Magh Tuireadh that the stone was cast from a Sling; it is only said that he threw a "liic tailm", or "Sling-Stone", at him; and it could hardly be otherwise, as they were talking face to face at the time.

This, it will be recollected, was not an ordinary stone, but the famous tathlum, or Composition-Ball, of which some account is given in the ancient poem quoted in a former lecture. It is, however, stated in the version preserved in the Book of Leinster, that in this case it was with a stone "out of his sling" he struck him.

Story of Duibhlinn; (instance of the use of the Sling-Stone).

The next reference to a Sling and Sling-Stone, or Ball, as already mentioned, is found in the Dinnseanchas, in the article on the origin of the name Duibh-linn, or Black-pool, (of which the name of Dublin is but a corruption); a spot which was probably that part of the River Liffey which in later times was known by the name of poll, or "the hole", or pool; and the name of which is now preserved to some extent in Poll beg, or Poolbeg Street, that is, Little Hole, or Little Pool Street, on the lower quays of the city of Dublin; and in the name of the lighthouse on the south side of the river. The legend, which is a wild one, refers to circumstances and persons of whom all other accounts are now lost, probably for ever, and runs as follows, in prose and verse:—

"Duibh-linn, why so named? It is not unpleasant to tell. Dubh, the daughter of Rodubh, son of Cas, son of Glas-gamhna, was the wife of Enna, son of Nos, of the hill of Forchartinn [near Dublin]. Enna had another wife unknown to Dubh, whose name was Aeté, daughter of Ochand, son of Cnucha. When the lady Dubh, who was a druidess and poetess, discovered the infidelity of her husband, she became jealous; and she one day took a walk along the sea-side, till she came opposite Ochand's house. Here she pronounced a druidical charm on the tide, which swelled up so as to overwhelm the house and drown the rival lady Aeté, the water having risen above her. Now Ochand had a servant whose name was Margen, who perceiving the baneful effects of the incantation, turned on the druidess and shot a Caer Clis [or "Composition-ball"], equal to any tath-

lum, from his taball [or sling], towards her (from the opposite side of the river), which struck her, and she fell into the pool; and hence the name of Duibhlinn, and also of Ath Liag Mairgené [or the Ford of Margen's Sling-Stone], because it was there Margen threw his cast, of which the poet sang:—

LECT. XIII.
Story of Duibhlinn; (instance of the use of the Sling-Stone.)

- "The daughter of Rodubh, son of brave Cas,
Son of gentle Cas, son of Glas-gamhna;
The wife of Enna, son of comely Nos,
Who ruled in the Hill of Forcharthan.
"She was a druidess and a generous poetess,—
The daughter of Rodubh of noble mien,—
She was a prophetess to foretell all occurrences, Till she was drowned through one fatal shot.
"Enna had also to his fair blooming wife
Aeté the daughter of Ochand,
Who was the son of friendly Cnucha,
A fact that brought misery to Rodubh's daughter.
"Jealousy seized on the daughter of Rodubh,—
It was not a very cheerful visitor,—
Whereupon she spoke a sea incantation
Because she loved not her favoured rival.
"She was perceived by honest cheerful Margen,
The highly trusted servant of Ochand,
Who threw a missive ball in her path,
Which struck the kingly daughter of Rodubh.
"Then died, though by no enemy slain,
Her noble and illustrious father;
The fair towering tree died before night,
After the death of his (Rodubh's) daughter".

We have here, too, another Athliag, or "stone-ford", deriving its name from a circumstance, such as Athliag Finn; but the obliteration of ancient local names by the spread of Dublin as a city has given some new name to that part of the Liffey which must have been known as Ath Liag Mairgené. It seems probable that it was somewhere about Wood Quay.

In this very ancient legend we have another important instance of the use of a peculiarly shaped stone to be cast from the Sling, as well as from the hand, in ancient times; and although it is said here to have been a caer clis, or Conglomerate missive, "equal to" or like the tathlum of the Battle of Magh Tuireadh, still we may safely take it to have been a stone artificially fashioned for the sling and reserved for some extraordinary occasion, while the first stone that came to hand may have been used on ordinary occasions.

We have another curious instance of the use of the Sling and

LECT. XIII.

Death of Meave,
(Medbh) Queen of Connacht,
by a Sling-
Stone.

Ball in the ancient account of the death of the celebrated Medbh, or Meave, queen of Connacht, so often mentioned in former lectures.

This Medbh had been first married to the celebrated Concobar Mac Nessa, king of Ulster; but she seemed more calculated to govern many men than to be governed by one man, and she soon abandoned Concobar and returned to her father, the monarch Eochaidh Feidhlech, to Tara, who shortly after set her up as the independent queen of the province of Connacht. A fierce and implacable jealousy and hatred, carried out in an unceasing border warfare, continued to rage for many years between Medbh and her former husband; until at length Concobar, in the course of one of his expeditions against the kingdom of his quondam wife, received his death-wound (as will be remembered) from the "ball made out of the hardened brain of Mesgedhra", the King of Leinster, which was cast at him by the Connacht Champion Ceat Mac Magach; a transaction of which I gave a full account in a former lecture.<sup>(221)</sup>

Now, at the time that king Concobar found himself abandoned by Medbh, he repaired to her father, to Tara, and sought and obtained the hand of another daughter of his, whose name was Eithné,—(a name which means, literally, the sweet kernel of a nut). By this princess Concobar had a son who came into the world after his mother's death; for, having fallen into the river anciently called Glaisé Bearramain, (in Westmeath), Eithné died of the effects of the accident, though taken up before life was extinct; and having been near her confinement at the time, her side was cut open, and the infant, which proved to be a son brought forth alive, who received the name of Furbaidhé;—Furbadh being the ancient Gaelic name of what medical science now calls the Cæsarian operation. (I may observe here that the river which before was called Glaisé Bearramain has been called Eithné ever since that princess lost her life in it; and that it is now the well-known river Inny,<sup>(222)</sup> in the county of Westmeath.)

Young Furbaidhé grew up in time to be a man and a warrior; and when long afterwards his father lost his life in consequence of the wound inflicted on him through the malignant contrivance of Queen Medbh, he was resolved to be revenged of her, though the undertaking was difficult to be performed, seeing that she was always well guarded. Circumstances, however, favored his design, for Medbh's consort,

<sup>(221)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., p. 275.

<sup>(222)</sup> [A slight corruption of the correct pronunciation of the Irish name, Eithné.]

Aíkill, was slain near his own palace of Cruachan by the celebrated Ulster hero Conall Cearnach; and Medbh being then old, withdrew from public life to Inis Clothrann, (an island of Lough Ree, in the Shannon above Athlone, between the present counties of Roscommon and Westmeath, but nearer to the latter). Here the aged queen was accustomed to wash every morning in a certain spring on the east side of the island; and Furbaidhé having discovered this circumstance, came stealthily, unperceived; and measured with a thread the exact distance from the spring to the opposite bank of the river, on the Westmeath side. With the measure of this distance Furbaidhé returned home to Ulster, where he set up two poles at the distance of the length of the thread asunder, and with the thread or line extended between them. On the top of one of the small poles he placed a ball, and taking his stand at the other, with his crann-tabhaill, or Sling, in his hand, he commenced shooting at the ball, his aim following the direction of the thread. He continued this practice until he became so expert and accurate that he never would miss striking the ball on the far pole; and now being thoroughly certain of the unerring accuracy of his aim, he set out from Ulster, and arriving on the bank of the Shannon opposite to his enemy's favourite washing-place, he took his stand there by night, and waited for her coming at early morn. The aged and unsuspecting queen, true to her custom, repaired early to the spring, and commenced her ablutions. Furbaidhé's time had now come: he placed a well-balanced stone in his crann-tabhaill, and took deliberate aim; the stone flew unerringly, struck queen Medbh in the forehead, and killed her on the spot.

LECT. XIII.

Death of Meave,
(Medbh) Queen of Connacht,
by a Sling-
Stone.

It does not appear from this tale of what particular form the stone or ball was which Furbaidhé used on this important occasion. It will be collected, however, from the accounts of the Taithlum and the Caer Clis already described, and from a few other references to the Sling, which shall follow below, that the most approved shape was the globular, though in time of necessity any shaped stone may have been used.

Of the shape of the Sling-Stone.

It will be seen also that iron or bronze balls were sometimes used in the sling; and such balls must have been too precious to be wasted on any but objects worthy the attainment of a champion.

Of the use of Slingballs of Iron and Bronze.

In all our ancient writings there is found no man whose name is so much connected with the use of the sling as the celebrated Ultonian champion Cuchulainn; there scarcely occurs a reference to him anywhere that his practice and accuracy of aim at the sling are not spoken of, but more particularly in the nar-

Use of the Sling by
Cuchulainn.

LECT. XIII. rative of the celebrated Táin Bo Chualgné, of which so much has been said in the course of these lectures.

Use of the Sling by
Cuchulainn.

On the very day on which Cuchulainn, who was still in his teens, received the arms of championship at Emania, from Concobar Mac Nessa, king of Ulster, he, in accordance with ancient custom, directed his chariot to a border of the province, to consecrate his arms by bathing them in the blood of an enemy. The border to which he directed his course, we are told, was that of East Meath, or Bregia; and at a point at which it meets the province of Ulster, on the right bank of the little river Mattock, where it falls into the Boyne, (a little below the chief entrance to Neterville house, on the road between Drogheda and Slane, in the county of Meath). Here stood an ancient fort, (the ruins of which are still I may observe, in ample preservation). This fort was the residence of Nechtan Sceinú, his three sons, and his wife. Cuchulainn came up to the gate, where he was met by Foill, the eldest of Nechtan Sceinú's three sons. But when the boy-champion's charioteer saw this mature warrior coming towards his young master, he apprised him of the disparity between them, and the hopeless issue of a successful combat with him. To this discourse Cuchulainn answered:

"It is not to me it is proper to speak thus, O Ibar", said the boy. 'I shall put my hand to the deil clis [sling-rod,] that is, to the iron ball, and it shall strike him on the front of his shield and on the front of his forehead; and it will carry the measure of the ball of his brain out through the back of his head, so that it shall become a flaming red mass outside, and that the light of the sky shall be visible through his head'.

"Foill, the son of Nechtan, then came forward; and he (Cuchulainn) put his hand to his deil clis, [or sling-rod,] and threw a choice throw of the ball at him; and it struck him on the front of his shield, and on the front of his face; and it carried the measure of the ball of his brain out through the back of his head".<sup>(223)</sup>

Again it is stated that, on Cuchulainn's return to Emania after slaying the three sons of Nechtan Sceinú, his horses flew so fast that the missive which he threw from his tailm, or Sling,

<sup>(223)</sup> original:—in numpá ir cóir dúicir fain do páo, a íbar, ar in mac bec. do beppá mo laim fón veit clir do .i. fonn-ubull n-ápnaróe, ocu tecma illaino a fceit ocu illaino a éain ocu beparó comérom in ubail óa innchinn éia éulaoraí co noingne nether deis de fú a cenó a neccair combac léim lepbair aeóir éia na cenó.

Táin immach fóill mac neccain. Tucam a laim fón veit clir do. Ocu fceit roic n-urair donó áball uao co capla illaino a fceit, ocu illaino a éain ocu beipró comérom in n-ubail óa innchinn éia a éulaoraí co noerna neé epver de fú a cenó in éccair comba leir lepbair aeóir éia na cenó.

before him, was caught by him before it fell to the ground. All these incidents, however, are stated to have taken place previous to the Táin Bo Chuailgné; but the following references to his sling achievements are taken from that curious old tale.

LECT. XIII.
Use of the Sling by
Cuchulainn.

"Cuchulainn declared then at Methin Port [the name of a ford on the border of Meath and Louth], that when he would first see Ailill or Medbh, [the king and queen of Connacht], he would cast stones at them from his taball, [sling]. And this he did too; for he cast a stone from his tailm and killed the Togmhall [squirrel] that sat on Medbh's shoulder on the south side of the ford; whence that place is called Meithé Togh; and he killed the bird which perched on Ailill's shoulder, on the north side of the ford; whence that place is called Meithé an Eoin".<sup>(221)</sup>

And again: "Cuchulainn killed thirty warriors of them with the tailm, [sling]".<sup>(225)</sup>

And again: "In this place Cuchulainn killed an hundred men of them each night of the three nights that they encamped there, by plying his taball against them".<sup>(226)</sup>

In another place, queen Medbh sends her beautiful daughter Finn-abhair, accompanied by one of her simpletons (a class of people whose infirmity rendered them inviolable), to Cuchulainn, with terms of peace; but the simpleton was dressed like king Ailill, the maiden's father, and intended to pass himself as such on Cuchulainn; the latter, however, detected him, and "threw a liic tailmé, or sling-stone, which he had in his hand, at him, and which struck him in the head, and knocked his brains out".<sup>(227)</sup>

And again, in the combat between Cuchulainn and the Connacht warrior Caur, it is said:

"Caur had been throwing missives at the face of his (Cuchulainn's) shield, until a third part of the day had passed; and he was not able to send a single blow or thrust home to him, such was his (Cuchulainn's) scientific dexterity. * * * Cuchulainn then glanced at him, and shot the missive ball which he had in his hands at him, over the boss and border of his shield, and it passed through the skull of the giant clear out,"<sup>(228)</sup>

(224) original:—bagair Cuculainn hi Meitin port iarrin, in accigeo aillil no meob, no cicepo cloic ar a tabaill forru. Uo gnirom on ona, eodon oo leici cloic ar a tailm, conopt in togmall boi for gualainn meobe fur in at anveir, ir ve atá meit cós, ocuf no opt in n-én boi for gualainn aillilla fu at anuaro; ir ve atá meite in n-éom.

(225) original:—bpuir Cuculainn tpeao laeé vob cur in tailm.

(226) original:—'Dornetac Cuculainn iurtoiu ongan ceo fer cada avote vob, na tui avote m-batar ann, gabair tabaill vob.

(227) original:—Speir lic telma boi ina lám fair, con fepcainn ina teno co tuc a mmoio ar.

(228) original:—Roboi ona Caur oc airmmbeirte garcio hi tuamaim a

LECT. XIII.

This certainly was not a cast from a sling; but it is clear that it was a sling-ball, or Caer Clis, cast from the hand; the distance between the combatants being too short to admit of the convenient use of the Deil Clis, or Sling Rod.

It would be tedious and unprofitable to follow out to the end these short quotations from the Táin Bo Chuailgné, and other tracts, relative to the use of the Sling, under its different names of Taball, Crann-Tabhaill, Deil-Clis, and Tailm.

Of the
Taball.

Of the
Crann-Tabhaill.

The word Taball, a sling, would appear to be cognate with the Greek word "Ballo", from which "Ballista", the name of a warlike engine to throw or shoot stones, is derived. The Crann-Tabhaill, or Staff-Sling, on the other hand, suggests the Roman "Fustabulum", an engine which was formed simply by running a thong or strap of skin or leather through near the lower and somewhat flattened end of a staff of from two and an half to three feet in length; in using which by placing a stone between the staff and the strap, at the point of intersection, drawing the tapering end of this strap of leather tightly up to the head of the staff, and swinging and letting it go, like the ordinary string sling, you have a kind of sling or casting engine of much more power and certainty of aim than the string sling. This instrument was called Crann-Tabhaill, because of the Crann or Staff; and the annexed word being Tabhaill (ending in the nominative case with the slender vowel i, the sign of a plural nominative, and not the singular Taball, without the final i.) clearly proves that the instrument contained a plurality of parts.

Of the Deil-Clis.

The Deil Clis is also a compound word, formed from Deil, a Rod, wand, or slender staff, and Cleas, any artificial missive weapon, but in this instance a round ball of stone, iron, lead, bronze, etc. Wherever the use of this instrument, the Deil Clis is spoken of, it is always found that the missive shot from it was a ball, and not a common stone, as generally, if not always, in the Taball or Crann-Tabhaill.

Of the Tailm.

The third kind of sling is called Tailm; and this word is derived by Cormac's glossary from tell and fuaím, which he explains as "the clashing of the thongs and their clangour"; (229) and however far-fetched this derivation may appear to be, it leaves no doubt as to the nature of the slinging instrument so often mentioned in our old writings under the name of Tailm.

pcéit corpuice tpián ino laí fpuíream, ocur mí conterpiaro béim na fopgab fáir la tcepa na clep. * * * * Danecai cuculáinn peá fpaíci in n-ubull-éler capparó ina láim; colluio icir cobparó ocur bpiomn in pcéit, colluio tpiá na éenn ino áigíar.

(229)

original:—Tobem na n-iall ocur an-uam.

LECTURE XIV.

[Delivered 11th June, 1858.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE; (continued). Recapitulation of names of Weapons anciently in use in Erin. Descriptions of Arms and of Costume in the Tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgne. Story of the Táin. Description of the Herald, Mac Roth. Description of the Champion, Fergus Mac Roigh. Of the Cletine, or Little Spear, of Cuchulainn. Description of the "Armed Chariot" of Cuchulainn; and of the Charioteer, Laegh. Description of the several combats, with various different weapons, between Cuchulainn and Ferdiaidh. Of the "Gae-Bulga", of Cuchulainn.

DURING the last three lectures we were occupied with the names, fashions, and materials in general, of the different weapons of offence and warfare of which our most ancient writings make any mention. The number and variety of such weapons is comparatively limited; and it may be better to recapitulate them here before we enter upon another period of our history, in which the same weapons, indeed, with one exception, are still found in use, but with some addition to their number and variety.

The weapons mentioned as having been in use in the battle of the first or southern Magh Tuireadh, were; the Craisech, or pointless Spear; the Fiarlanna, or curved pointless Blade; the Swords, and the Clubs, of the Firbolgs; and the Manais, or Broad thrusting Spear; the Slegh, or Pointed Spear (for casting); and the Sword, of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

Recapitulation, (of Weapons anciently in use).

In the battle of the second or northern Magh Tuireadh, we find, in common, among the Tuatha Dé Danann and their invaders, the Fomorians: the Slegh, or Pointed long Spear; the Fogha, or Short Spear; the Saighead-Bolg [Saiget Bolc], or belly-Dart; the Claidheamh, or Sword; and the Lic Tailmé, or Sling-Stone, or, according to the second version, the Tathlum, or Composition Sling-Ball.

To these primitive weapons we find added, in the time of Labhraidh Loingsech, the Laighen Leathan-ghlais, or "Broad-green thrusting-Spear", of the Gauls; and to these, again, in the time of the monarch Eochaidh Feidhilech, and the battle of Ath Comair, were added the Lia Lamha Laich, or Champion's Hand-Stone, which we have traced down to Mogh Ruith the druid, and Find Mac Cumhaill, in the third century, and to Eochaidh, the son of Enna Ceinnselach, king of Leinster, in the fifth.

It is remarkable that there is no mention made of the Champion's Hand-Stone in the battles of the Táin Bo Chuailgne, nor LECT. XIV. in the battle of Ros-na-Righ, which were fought in the intermediate period, or about the time of the Incarnation.

Descriptions
of Arms and Costume in the "Táin Bo Chuailgné".

These battles, however, particularly the battles of the Táin Bo Chuailgné, supply us with much more minute details of the dress, weapons, and other particulars of the warriors who took part in them, than anything which has gone before them; the ancient account of the battle of the first Magh Tuireadh which has come down to us being written in a much more matter of fact and less exuberant age than that of the Táin Bo Chuailgné, which, in its present form, is ascribed to the close of the sixth century.

Story of the
*Táin Bo
Chuailgné*.

As this Táin Bo, or Cow-spoil, of Cuailgné, has been so often mentioned already, and partially described in former lectures, it will be sufficient here to recall to mind that it is the history of an hostile expedition made by Ailill and Medbh, (or Meave), the king and queen of Connacht, at the head of the forces of Connacht, Munster, and Leinster, into the southern part of the province of Ulster, (namely, into Cuailgné, the district lying between Drogheda and Dundalk), for the purpose of carrying away by force a famous bull called the Donn Chuailgné, or the Brown-Bull of Cuailgné; that at the time this expedition was undertaken all the men of Ulster above a certain age were, according to the story, lying in a state of torpor or debility, under a spell which a certain woman whom they had wronged had worked on them, and which attacked them periodically, and for a certain time; and that thus, at the time of the hostile incursion into their country, there was no one to check the course of the invaders but the young hero Cuchulainn, who was not affected by the spell, in consequence of his youth at the time. Cuchulainn was the son of the chief of that territory of Cuailgné, into which the invaders first passed.

Immediately on the appearance of the invading host, Cuchulainn confronted them, and claiming the observance of the strict laws of ancient Gaelic Chivalry, demanded single combat, insisting that the invaders should not intrude farther into his territory until the victory of their champion and his own defeat should justify their progress. And we learn from the story that in fact according to this arrangement, the advance of the invaders was regulated by a succession of single combats, in which several of the most celebrated warriors of the king and queen of Connacht met their death at the hands of Cuchulainn.

But although the invaders undertook to regulate their advance into the province of Ulster by the results of these combats, still they continued to advance farther north after every one of them, until at last they took up a very threatening position on the brink of the little river on which stands the present LECT. XIV. town of Ardee (Ath-Firdiaidh), in the county of Louth.

Before arriving so far, however, queen Medbh proposed favourable terms to Cuchulainn, not indeed in good faith, but with the view of gaining the object of her expedition by means more expeditious and less expensive of the lives of her best warriors.

These terms were conveyed to the young hero by Mac Roth, the queen's chief herald; and I may here quote the whole passage of the story in which this officer is introduced, so interesting is it not only in reference to the military customs of the time, but also for the sake of the description it contains of the arms, dress, and accoutrements of an ancient herald.

When Mac Roth approaches Cuchulainn's quarters, he is perceived by the vigilant charioteer of the latter, so celebrated in our legendary history, Laegh Mac Riagabhra:

"'Here comes a single champion towards us, O Cuchulainn,' said Laegh. 'What sort of a champion is he?' said Cuchulainn. 'A brown-haired, broad-faced, beautiful youth; a splendid brown cloak on him; a bright bronze spear-like brooch fastening his cloak. A full and well-fitting shirt to his skin. Two firm shoes between his two feet and the ground. A hand-staff of white hazel in one hand of his; a single-edged sword with a sea-horse-tooth hilt, in his other hand.' 'Good, my lad,' said Cuchulainn, 'these are the tokens of an herald.'"<sup>(230)</sup>

Description of the Herald, Mac Roth.

Mac Roth's mission to Cuchulainn proved fruitless, as the latter would not accept the conditions offered him; and queen Medbh then called up Fergus Mac Roigh, an Ulster prince, and one of the greatest champions of the time, who had been for some years in exile at her court, to go from her with conditions of peace to Cuchulainn, who had been formerly the pupil of this very Fergus in the great military school of Emania. Fergus consented to undertake this mission; and in the following short account of his personal appearance, as he appeared to Cuchulainn's charioteer, Laegh Mac Riagabhra, we have a vivid picture of a prince and warrior of the highest class in these remote ages. The language is that of poetical exaggeration; but it is only the exaggeration of expression.

At the time that Fergus approached them, Cuchulainn and

<sup>(230)</sup> original:—Oen laeð eucaino, Cuculaino, for laeg. Cinnar laeð? ar Cuculaino. Gilla donno, speelechan, alaino; bract donno deyrsgaitec immi; bput-gae umaroic ma bput. Taplém eprepari rna éneir. Óá bein bpoice etip a óá coirp ir talam. Macao-long finnécull ir in dapa laim; claoeb letfaebnae, co n-claib óet, irno laim anail óó. Aile, a gilla, ar Cuculaino, comapta eclaige rin.

LECT. XIV. his charioteer were amusing themselves at casting a wooden spear; when the charioteer suddenly exclaimed:

Description
of the Champion
Fergus Mac
Róigh.

“‘A single champion approaches us, O Cuchulainn’, said Laegh. ‘What description of champion?’ said Cuchulainn. ‘As large as a mountain on the plain appears to me the chariot in which the warrior is seated [said Laegh]. As large as the top of a noble tree which stands on the lawn of a noble castle, appears to me the branching, flowing, fair yellow, light-golden, manly fleece of hair on his head. [He wears] a crimson cloak with a deep fringe of golden thread on him; and an inlaid golden brooch in that cloak. [He bears] a broad-green manais [or heavy spear], blazing red, in his hand. [He carries] a sheltering, well-studded shield, with a boss of red gold, over him. A sword as long as the oar of a canoc, in a serrated scabbard, lies across the two thighs of the huge haughty man that sits within that chariot’.”<sup>(231)</sup>

The mission of Fergus was unsuccessful, and the single combats went on day after day, always to the advantage of Cuchulainn. Queen Medbh and her people were sorely annoyed at loss of so many of their bravest warriors; and it appearing to them that there was something supernatural in Cuchulainn’s Spear, the weapon with which he generally slew his opponents, (and which was called cletiné), they held a council to devise some stratagem besides the uncertain one of combat by which he could be deprived of it. The determination which they came to was, to send Redg the court satirist and poet of king Ailill and queen Medbh, to ask Cuchulainn to make him a present of the spear, for it was not usual in those times to refuse any request which a man of that profession made:

“And after this Redg, Ailill’s satirist, went by advice to ask for the cletiné, that is, Cuchulainn’s spear. ‘Give me thy spear’, said the satirist: ‘Not so, indeed’, said Cuchulainn, ‘but I shall give thee other gifts’. ‘I shall not accept them’, said the satirist. [Cuchulainn] then rebuked the satirist, when he would not receive from him what he had offered him. And the satirist said that he would disparage his honour since he would not give him the cletiné. Cuchulainn then threw the cletiné at him, and transfixing him through the skull across.

<sup>(231)</sup> Oen laeč écuinn, a Chuču lainn, ar laeg. Cinnar laeč, ar Cuču-lainn. Méitir lim óen na púm-rlaib ir mó bir for moir macaire in cappat ril fóno oclais. Méitir lim óen na púm-bil bir for fachtir púm-óim, in folc cnaibac, ualac, rinobuor, fóp-óroa, ferpcáitir fail immo óeno. Fuan conera corpharac ór fnaichí immi; oels n-óroa, n-ecoréa, rin bpuic. Manair letan-glár ar veing-lappo ‘na lainn. Sciad cóbraoac, óonualac, co cóbraio oir veing, uara. Claoeob fáta ríclai, co n-ecparaib ferroa, for oib ríarfaib ruioigti oono óclais moir, boirraio fail irin cappat ar meóón.

'That is an overpowering gift,' said the satirist; [and he dropped dead.] It is from this circumstance that the ford of Ath-Tolam-Sed has its name. There is also a little ford to the east of it, into which the bronze of the cletiné fell; the name of this ford is [thence known as] the Uman-Sruth, or the Bronze Stream". (232)

This short quotation is valuable as showing that the Cletiné, Of the "Cletiné", or Little Spear of Cuchulainn.
Cuchulainn's favourite light spear, was made of bronze; indicating clearly that though perhaps iron may have been introduced in the manufacture of military weapons in Erin at this time, still bronze continued also to be used. Positive evidences of this fact, such as this, are scarce in our ancient writings; doubtless because things that were common at the time, just as in our own times, were not deemed worthy of special record.

After several successful combats, Cuchulainn at length, (so the tale goes on to tell us), began to fail in strength and vigour, from constant exertion; and it appears that at last he fell suddenly into a deep sleep, which lasted for three days. During this time a party of one hundred and fifty of the noble youths of Ulster who had heard of his distress came to his relief, and kept the enemy in play during his sleep; but they were all slain at last, one after another.

When Cuchulainn awoke and saw the slaughter of his friends, his rage knew no bounds. So he ordered his charioteer, Laegh, the son of Riangabhra, to yoke for him his "armed Chariot", that he might rush through and around the host of his enemies, and deal death and destruction on all sides. The descriptions of this charioteer, the chariot, the horses, and the champion himself, in this passage, are rather long; but the passage contains so much of importance to the subject of this lecture that I cannot omit any part of it. Here also, as generally throughout this ancient tale, the picture is highly painted, and the details full of poetic exaggeration; but there can be little doubt but that the groundwork is correct in all its essential features.

"Then", says the tale, "arose the charioteer, and put on his wild chariotearing dress. Of this wild chariotearing dress which he put on was his graceful frock of skins;—which was light and airy; spotted and striped; made of deer skins; close-fitting, so as not to interfere with the free action of his arms outside.

(233) original:—1<sup>o</sup> iapam luio Reog cainte aílilla a comairli eúcaí vo cúimró in cletine .i. gáí Conculainn. Tuc dampa vo gáí, or in cainte. acc, om, or Cuculainn, áct vo bér peota vait. Nao gebra ón, an in cainte. Segna rom óna in cainte, uair na faet uao a tairgí vo. Ocuí arbert in cainte no bepaó a enec maní bepaó in cletine. Fodeirpo Cuculainn iapum in cletine vo colluro tpa na éeno por tairgma. 1<sup>o</sup> tolam [.i. réc talman] in réc ro, ól in cainte. 1<sup>o</sup> te atá at Tolam sét. áta óna at fupir anair aini in appapap an uma don életiniú; humaníput aini mo atá pain.—(leabap na h-úrópe, fol. 34, b,b.)

LECT. XIV.

Description
of the "Armed Chariot" of
Cuchulainn;
and the Charioteer.

"He put on, outside this frock, his raven-black cloak, which Simon Magus had made for the king of the Romans, who gave it to Concobar Mac Nessa, [king of Ulster,] who gave it to Cuchulainn; and Cuchulainn gave it to his charioteer. The charioteer then put on his crested, dazzling, quadrangular helmet; shining in various colours; inscribed with various devices; with its curtain falling over his shoulders behind. Much did this helmet add to his grace, and not at all to his incumbrance.

"With his hand he set [then] upon his forehead the red-yellow band, like a blade of red gold which had been purified over the edge of an anvil. This he put on in token of his Charioteership, to distinguish him from his master.

"He took [then] the spurring-goads of his horses, and his long whip, in his right hand; he took the restraining instruments of his horses, that is, the reins, in his left hand, to regulate his charioteering.

"Then did he throw their 'loricas of beautiful iron' over his steeds, which covered them from their faces to their tails; studded with little blades, little spikes, little lances, and hard-pointed spears; and every motion of that chariot brought some sharp point next anyone whom it approached; so that every angle and every face, and every point, and every head, of that same chariot, was a sure path of cutting and lacerating.

"Then did he cast a spell of invisibility over the steeds and over his companion, [or master], so that no one in the camp could see them, whilst they could distinctly see everyone.

"It was no wonder that he should cast such a spell over them, since he possessed the three perfections of a charioteer, on that day; namely, to leap over the rails of the chariot, to drive unerringly, and to poise his whip correctly.

"It was then the champion and warrior, and perfection of martial heroes above all the men of earth, namely Cuchulainn, the son of Soaltann, equipped himself in his array of battle and fighting and combat. Of that battle array which he put on may be counted seven and twenty shirts,<sup>(233)</sup> cored and smoothed, and closely braced on with strings and lines, and rollers [refedaib, bodkins or pins?], so that his fury may not exceed his reason, whenever his manly rage should boil up. He put on over these his battle-girdle of hard-tanned leather, cut from the backs of seven full-grown ox-hides, which encircled him from his hips to his arm-pits, and which he wore for the purpose of repelling

(233) [This passage of the Tale requires investigation. Unfortunately, the translator's notes, in explanation of the existing form of the Tale, were not completed up to the time of his death; and this among other passages must therefore appear without comment.]

javelins [gai], points [rend], and [sharp-pointed] irons [iaerun], spears [sleg], and darts [saiget]; so that they always rebounded from him in the same way as if it had been from a stone, or a rock, or a bone, they had rebounded.

LECT. XIV.
Description
of the "Armed Chariot" of
Cuchulainn.

"He then put on his apron of striped satin [srebnaide sróil], with its border of mottled white gold, over the softer part of his lower body: he then put on his apron of brown leather, cut from the backs of four full-grown well-tanned ox-hides, over his battle-girdle of ox-hides, and his apron of striped satin.

"Then did the royal champion take his arms of battle, and fight, and combat.

"Of these battle-arms which he took, were his eight little Swords, [claidbini], along with his bright-shining, tooth-hilted Sword [colydet]. He took his eight little Spears, [sléigini], along with his flesh-piercing Spear, and his Belly Spear, [saiget bolc]. He took his eight little Darts, [gothnaula], along with his Ivory Dart, [goth-ndét]. He took his eight short Spears, [cleitini], along with his Sling-rod.

"He took his eight Missive Shields, [sciatha elis], along with his great, curved, black-red shield; in the hollow of which a full-grown hog would fit; [and which was] bound all round with a scalloped keen-edged rim, so sharp as to cut a hair against a stream, so that whenever the champion used it as a weapon, it was equally that he cut with his shield, and with his spear, and with his sword.

"And he then put on his helmet of battle, and of combat, and of fighting, on his head, from every recess and from every angle of which issued the shout, as it were, of an hundred warriors; because it was alike that women of the valley [de banunaig], and hobgoblins [bacanaig], and wild people of the glen [geinti glinda], and demons of the air [demna uéoir], shouted in front of it, and in rear of it, and over it, and around it, wherever he went, at the spurting of the blood of warriors and heroes upon it.

"He then threw his mantle of invisibility over him, manufactured from the precious fleeces of the land of the immortals, which had been brought to him by Manannan Mac Lir, [the great navigator of the Tuatha Dé Danann], from the King of Sorcha",—[now Portugal].

Cuchulainn being thus equipped, (we are told), mounted his chariot, and drove around the hosts of his enemies in a furious succession of narrowing circles; driving them closer and closer together; assailing them with his deadly weapons at all points; and brushing close to them and through them, with his armed chariot, tearing, maiming, and killing them in all directions,

LECT. XIV.

Descriptions
from the
*Táin Bo
Cathlige*,
(continued).

and escaping himself in the sudden confusion and disorder into which he threw them.

When the invading host had recovered from their surprise, after the sudden panic into which Cuchulainn's manoeuvre had thrown them, queen Medbh lost no time in inducing by her entreaties and gifts several of her bravest champions, in succession, to fight with Cuchulainn; each of whom in his turn received his death, at the hands of the wonderful Ultonian youth. At last, and after considerable solicitation, and the promise of large gifts and immunities, together with her fair daughter Finn-abhair, in marriage, she prevailed on Ferdiaidh Mac Damain, to engage in single combat with Cuchulainn.

This Ferdiaidh was one of the Damnonian branch of the old Firbolg race of the sea-board of Connacht; (from which branch the well-known Bay of Erris, in the present county of Mayo, was anciently called Irrus Domnain, or Errus of the Damnonians). He and Cuchulainn were old acquaintances, having both been pupils at the same time in the celebrated military college of the lady Scathach, (a famous school of arms in those ages on the north-east coast of Scotland). The mutual friendship contracted by the champions at this foreign academy continued warm and unbroken after their return to their native country; and nothing could surprise Cuchulainn more than when he discovered that his attached friend and school-fellow had been induced by the blandishments of the wily queen of Connacht to undertake to engage in battle with him under such unequal circumstances. He knew, too, that, with the exception of the "gae bulga", or "belly-dart", alone, his opponent was as accomplished as himself in the use of all military weapons and feats of championship, as well as in all the advantages of manly vigour, strength, and courage.

Ferdiaidh at length came to the ford at which the combat was to be fought, where Cuchulainn came to talk to him and remonstrate with him on the unfairness of the combat which he had undertaken; and after a good deal of conversation over old reminiscences, (conversation which in the story is carried on chiefly in rhyme), Cuchulainn ends the conference, in the following words, which are given in prose and verse:

"'Well, Ferdiaidh,' said Cuchulainn, 'it is for these reasons thou oughtst not to come to fight and combat with me; because when we were with Scathach, and with Aifé, it was together we always went into every battle and battle-field, to every combat and every fight, through every forest, and every desert, through every dark, and through every lonely place':

And having so said, he repeated the following words in verse: LECT. XIV.

"We were hearty friends;
We were companions in the woods;
We were fellows of the same bed,
Where we slept the balmy sleep,
"After mortal battles abroad,
After many foreign expeditions,
Together we went, and accomplished
Every forest lesson along with Scathach".

Cuchulainn having concluded this short address, Ferdiaidh asks him with what weapons they should commence the battle on that day. Cuchulainn answers, that as it was Ferdiaidh that first sought the ford, it was for him to choose the weapons for that day. Ferdiaidh then asks him if he remembered the missive weapons of valour [airigtib gaisced] which they practised when with Scathach? and Cuchulainn answers, that he did. "If thou dost", said Ferdiaidh, "let us try them". So they then had recourse to their "missive weapons of valour".

Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and Fer-diaidh.

The description of this protracted combat preserves for us an account as minute of the weapons and mode of warfare of the time, as Homer's of those of the Greeks before Ilium.

"They took up", (proceeds the tale), "two equally-balanced shields for defence against missiles, and their eight ochar-chlis or Missive-Shields, and their eight cletiné, or Little Spears; and their eight colg-dets, or Ivory-hilted Small Swords; and their eight gotha-ndéts, or Ivory-shafted Spears; and they cast them at and from each other, so that they resembled a swarm of bees on a summer's day; and they threw no cast that did not strike. Each of them continued to cast those missiles at the other from the dawn of early morning to the full middle of the day, until all their various missiles were destroyed against the faces [tilib] and bosses of the missive shields; and although the throwing was of the best description, the defence was so superior that neither drew the other's blood during that time.

"Let us desist from these weapons now, Cuchulainn", said Ferdiaidh, 'because it is clear that it is not by them that our combat shall be decided'. 'Let us stop if thou thinkest the time has come', said Cuchulainn. They then threw their missiles away from them into the hands of their Charioteers".

The tale proceeds:

"What weapons shall we turn to now, O Cuchulainn?' said Ferdiaidh: 'Thou hast thy choice of weapons until night', said Cuchulainn, 'since it was thou that first came to the ford'. 'Let us now', said Ferdiaidh, 'turn to our straight,

LEOT. XIV.

Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and *Fer-
diadhl*.

elegant, smooth, hard sleighs (Light Spears), with their perfectly-hard strings of flax in them'. 'Let us indeed', said Cuchulainn. They then took two hard, firm shields upon them; and they then turned to their straight, elegant, smooth, hard spears, with perfectly-hard lines or strings of flax in them. Each of them began to cast the spears at the other, from the full middle of the day till the close of the evening; and though the warding off was of the best, still the throwing was so superior, that each of them bled, reddened, and wounded the other, in that time. 'Let us desist from this, now O Cuchulainn', said Ferdiadhl. 'Let us desist', said Cuchulainn. They stopped then, and threw their arms away from them into the hands of their charioteers.

"Each of them then went towards the other, and each put his arm around the other's neck, and embraced him three times. Their horses were in the same enclosure that night; and their charioteers sat at the same fire; and their charioteers prepared beds of green rushes for them, and supplied them with the pillows of wounded men. Then there came professors of healing and curing, to heal and cure them; and they applied healing and salving herbs and plants to their sores and their cuts and their many wounds. Every herb and every salve that was applied to the sores, cuts, and many wounds of Cuchulainn, he sent share of the same over the ford westward to Ferdiadhl, in order that the men of Erin should not have to say, if Ferdiadhl fell by him, that it was the consequence of an inequality of healing.

"They rested so for that night, and early on the next morning they repaired again to the ford of combat.

"'What arms shall we turn to on this day, O Ferdiadhl?' said Cuchulainn: 'To thee belongs the choice till night', said Ferdiadhl, 'because I had my choice of weapons in the days that have passed'. 'Let us then', said Cuchulainn, 'turn to our manaisibh muiirnecha, [or great heavy spears, (dat. pl. of manais)] this day; because the thrusting on this day is more convenient for us than the casting (or shooting) of yesterday: let our steeds be caught and our chariots yoked, until we fight from off our horses, on this day'. 'Let us indeed then', said Ferdiadhl. They then took upon them two broad, exceedingly firm shields, and turned to their great heavy spears, on that day. Each of them began to pierce, to perforate, and to lacerate the other, from the dawn of early morning to the close of the evening. If it had been customary for flying birds to pass through human bodies, they might have passed through their bodies on that day, and carried off lumps of gore and flesh from their cuts and wounds into the surrounding clouds and air.<sup>(234)</sup> And when the closing hour of evening came, their horses were tired, and their charioteers were fatigued, and the champions themselves were exhausted.

LECT. XIV.
Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and Fer-diadidh.

"'Let us cease now O Ferdiadidh,' said Cuchulainn, 'because our steeds are tired, our charioteers are fatigued, and if they are wearied, why should not we be wearied too?' And he then spoke this verse:

"'We are not bound to persevere
With Fomorian obduracy;
Let the cause be put in abeyance,
Now that the din of combat is over'.

"'Let us cease indeed, now,' said Ferdiadidh, 'if the time has come'.

"They ceased then: they cast their weapons away from them into the hands of their charioteers: each of them came towards the other, put his arms around his neck, and embraced him three times. Their steeds were put into the same enclosure that night, and their charioteers sat at the same fire. Their charioteers prepared a litter-bed of green rushes for them, and raised the pillows of wounded men for them. Professors of healing and curing came to examine, and attend, and watch by them for that night; however, they found nothing to be of efficacy to allay the pain and danger of their sores, their cuts, and their many wounds, but the application of charms, and spells, and incantations, to check their blood, and their pain, and the agonies of their wounds. Every charm, and every spell, and every incantation that was applied to the sores and wounds of Cuchulainn, he sent an equal share of them across the ford, to the west, to Ferdiadidh.

"They arose early the next morning, and repaired to the ford of combat. Cuchulainn perceived a great change of countenance and great gloominess upon Ferdiadidh, this day. 'Thou art in a bad state, to-day, O Ferdiadidh,' said Cuchulainn. 'Thy hair has become dark, thine eye has become dull, and thine own form, and thy countenance, and shape, have departed from thee'. 'It is not dread or terror of thee that makes me so this day indeed', said Ferdiadidh, 'because there is not in Erin this day a champion whom I am not able to subdue'. And Cuchulainn then began to groan and to lament; and he spoke these words (in verse); and Ferdiadidh answered:

C. "'O Ferdiadidh, if it be thou indeed,

<sup>(234)</sup> [This is another extreme instance of style—one of those upon which the translator had intended to offer some remarks in a special note, which was unfortunately not prepared before his death. The reader may be referred to the Historic Tale of the Battle of Magh Rath, published by the Irish Archaeol. Soc. in 1842.]

LECT. XIV.

Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and *Fer-
diadh*.

- Certain I am that thou art a poor-souled being
To have come at a woman's will
To fight with thy fellow-pupil'.
- F. "O Cuchulainn, 't is a wise decree,— Thou true warrior, thou true champion,—
That a man is forced to come To the sod whereon his death shall be'.
- C. "Finn-abhair, the daughter of queen Medbh, Whose superior beauty all must allow,
To thee was given, not for thy love,
But in order to prove thy mighty strength'.
- F. "My strength a while ago was proved,
O Cuchulainn, by a fair gauge;
One so brave I have not heard of,
Nor until this day have I ever found'.
- C. "Thou hast caused all that has happened,
O son of Daman, son of Dáiré,
To have come by the counsel of a woman
To measure swords with thy fellow-pupil'.
- F. "Should I have returned without combat with thee,
Though we were fellow-pupils, O comely Cu,
Bad should be my fame and my renown,
With Ailill and with Medbh of Cruachan'.
- C. "No person has conveyed food to his mouth, [i.e. has ever lived]
And no more [i.e. nor] has there been born
Of king or queen, without exception, [Any] one for whom I would [be induced to] injure thee'.
- F. "O Cuchulainn of many deeds,
It is not thou but Medbh that has betrayed me;
I shall obtain victory and renown,
But it is not on thee the fault shall lie'.
- C. "My heart within me is a mass of gore,
My life has nearly from me fled;
I deem it no addition to my other deeds
To fight with thee, O Ferdiadh'.

"After this dialogue Ferdiadh spoke and said: 'Much as thou hast been complaining of me', said Ferdiadh, 'what weapons shall we turn to this day?' 'Thou hast thy choice of weapons till night', said Cuchulainn, 'because it was I that had my choice on yesterday'. 'Let us then', said Ferdiadh, 'turn to our heavy, mighty, blow-dealing swords, this day, as it is certain that the cleaving to-day will bring us nearer to the termination of the battle than the thrusting on yesterday'. Let us', said Cuchu- lainn. They took upon them two great long shields this day. They turned to their great, mighty, blow-dealing swords. They began to cleave and cut down, to strike and to slash, until every piece of flesh which each of them cut from the shoulders and hips, and thighs of the other, was as large as the head of a month-old infant. They continued, each, to cleave the other in this manner, from the dawn of morning till the close of evening.<sup>(235)</sup>

LECT. XIV.
Description of the combats between
Cuchulainn
and Fer-
diadh.

“‘Let us cease now, O Cuchulainn’, said Ferdiadh: ‘Let us cease, indeed, if the time has come’, said Cuchulainn. They stopped: they threw their arms away from them into the hands of their charioteers. Though their meeting (in the morning) was that of two pleasant, happy, joyous, high-spirited persons, their separation at that night was the separation of two displeased, sorrowful, dispirited persons. Their steeds were not in the same field that night: their charioteers were not at the same fire.

“‘They spent that night as before; and in the morning Ferdiadh was up early and came alone to the ford of combat, because he knew that this was the day which should decide the combat and the fight; and he knew that either of them should fall on that day, there, or that both of them should fall. It was then he put on his suit of battle, and combat, and fighting, before Cuchulainn came to meet him; and, as part of that array of battle and fighting, he put on his apron of striped satin, with its border of fretted gold, next to his white skin. He put on his apron of brown leather, well sewn, over that outside. He then took a great, huge flag-stone, as large as a millstone, and secured it over this outside. He put his firm, deep apron of refined iron [literally, double-melted], over the great flat stone as large as a mill-stone, outside, in fear and in terror of the gae bulga, (or belly-dart) on that day. He put his crested helmet of battle, and combat, and fight, upon his head; in which were set four carbuncle gems, in its four sides; and it was garnished with bronze and crystal, and brilliant stones of the oriental world. He grasped his fretted, firm-pointed spear in his right hand. He slung his battle-sword by its bent hooks to his left side, with its hilt of pale gold and jointings of red gold. He threw his great shield with its beautiful pinnacles, over the declivity of his back; on which were fifty pointed bosses on each boss of which a full-grown hog might be spitted, besides its great centre-boss of red gold. Ferdiadh on this

<sup>(235)</sup> [The reader may be referred to an interesting example of the exaggerated heroic style in descriptions of combats such as this, in that of the combat of Roland and Olivier, in “Le Mariage de Roland”,—in La Légende des Siècles, par Victor Hugo.]

LECT. XIV

Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and *Fer-
diadh*.

day exhibited various noble and wonderful feats of scientific gladiatorial dexterity, which he never learned from any person, from tutoress or from tutor, neither from [the lady-professor] Scathach, nor from Uathach, nor from Aife, but performed [invented] by himself on that day, in preparation for Cuchulainn.

"Cuchulainn in due time reached him at the ford, and saw the weapons and feats which Ferdiadh put forth.' 'You see all this, my man Laegh,' said Cuchulainn, 'and provide me at once with such other weapons as these; and besides this, if it be I that shall be yielding this day, you are to irritate and reproach me, and speak evil of me, so that thereby my vigour and my anger may be increased; and should I be the vanquisher, you are to cheer me and praise me, and speak well of me, so that my courage may be the greater'. 'It shall be done, O Cuchulainn,' said Laegh.

(Cuchulainn's battle-array having been described already, it is omitted in the text as well as here).

"Then Cuchulainn put on his array of battle, and combat, and fight; and he performed many noble, wonderful, gladiatorial feats, on that day, which he had never learned from any one, not from Scathach, nor from Uathach, nor from Aife. Ferdiadh saw these feats; and he knew that they would be all brought to bear against himself in their turn.

"'What feat shall we decide upon, O Ferdiadh,' said Cuchulainn. 'To thee belongs the choice of weapons till night' said Ferdiadh. 'Let us come to the game of the Ford, then,' said Cuchulainn. 'Let us, indeed,' said Ferdiadh. Although Ferdiadh said this, he was sorely grieved to go there, because he knew it was at that game Cuchulainn had destroyed every champion and every warrior who fought him, that is, at the Game of the Ford.

"Each of them then began to shoot at the other with these weapons, from the dawn of early morning to the full mid-day; and when mid-day came, the anger of the champions became more furious; and each of them approached the other. It was then Cuchulainn sprang from the brink of the ford, and alighted on the boss of Ferdiadh's shield, seeking to strike him on the head over the border of the shield; upon which Ferdiadh gave the shield a blow of his left elbow, and cast Cuchulainn off from him as if he were a bird, back to the brink of the ford. Cuchulainn again sprang from the brink of the ford, and alighted on the boss of Ferdiadh's shield, for the purpose of striking him on the head. Ferdiadh gave the shield a stroke of his left knee, and cast Cuchulainn from him, like a little infant, back to the brink of the ford. Laegh, (Cuchulainn's charioteer) perceived all this. 'Alas!' said Laegh, 'the man who opposes you chastises you as a loving woman would her son; he spins you as a bubble spins on the water; he grinds you as a mill grinds dried malt; he pierces you as a lance pierces an oak; he entwines you as the woodbine entwines a tree; he pounces on you as a hawk pounces on a titmouse; so that you have no relation, or claim, or right, to bravery or to valour, henceforth, to the end of the world, you little deformed wretch', said Laegh.

LECT. XIV.

Description
of the Com-
bats between Cuchulainn
and *Fer-
diadhl*.

"Cuchulainn, then, the third time, with the swiftness of the wind, with the fleetness of the swallow, with the spring of the dragon, leaped upon the buoyancy of the air, and alighted on the boss of Ferdiadhl's shield, to endeavour to strike his head over the edge of the shield; upon which the champion shook the shield, and threw Cuchulainn off into the middle of the ford. It was then, indeed, that Cuchulainn's fury first arose; he became inflated and swollen like a blown bladder, so that he became a terrible, awful, many-coloured, wonderful rainbow; so that the great, brave champion stood the height of a Fomorian (i.e. a man of the sea,) over the head of Ferdiadhl, in proper height. Such was the closeness of the fight between them, that their heads met above, and their legs below, and their arms in the middle, over the borders and bosses of their shields. Such was the closeness of the fight between them that their shields were split and cloven, from their borders to their centres. Such was the intensity of the fight between them that their spears were turned, and bent, and strained from their points to their heels: such was the intensity of the fight between them, that they forced the river out of its bed and out of its power, so that the middle of the ford might afford a bed which a king or a queen might sleep in.

"It was at the feat of sharp swords they fought all this time; and at last Ferdiadhl found an unguarded moment upon Cuchulainn, and he made a blow of his tooth-hilted sword, and buried it in his body, so that his blood flowed into his girdle, so that the ford was brown from the hero's blood. Cuchulainn did not return this feat, because Ferdiadhl continued a succession of wonderful, heavy, quick blows on him; until at last Cuchulainn called to his charioteer, Laegh Mac Riagabhra, for the gae bulga or 'belly-dart'.

"This was the character of that dart: it was upon a stream it should be set, and it was from between his toes he should cast it. It made but the wound of one dart in entering the body; but it presented thirty inverted points against coming back; so that it could not be drawn from a person's body without opening it. And so when Ferdiadhl heard the 'belly-dart'

The "*Gae
Bulga*" of
Cuchulainn.

LECT. XIV.

The "*Gae
Bulga*" of
Cuchulainn.

called for, he suddenly dashed his shield down to protect the lower part of his body; upon which Cuchulainn struck him from the palm of his hand, with a spiky, short, dart, over the border of the shield and through the breast of his vest, so that it was visible out at his back after piercing his heart in his body! *Ferdiad*h threw the shield suddenly up to protect the upper part of his body, though it was a relief too late. In the meantime the Charioteer had set the "belly-dart" to the stream; and Cuchulainn caught it between his toes, and he darted it at *Ferdiad*h with such unerring aim and force, that it passed through the deep, firm, iron apron, broke the great, hard flag, which was as large as a mill-stone, in three parts, and passed through the lower part of his body into his belly, so that every part of him was filled with its inverted points. 'Enough!' said *Ferdiad*h, and he fell dead in the ford. And Cuchulainn sprang to him, and took him up in his arms, and carried him to the north side of the river, so that it should be himself, and not queen Medbh and her people that should obtain his trophies".—

And so, Cuchulainn, after lamenting in many pathetic verses the untimely fall of his early friend and fellow-pupil, orders his charioteer to strip him of his armour to obtain the celebrated gold brooch which queen Medbh presented to him; and then to cut open his body and recover the fatal Belly-Dart for him; all of which the dexterous charioteer soon performed. And thus ended the celebrated combat of Cuchulainn and *Ferdiad*h, so extravagantly told in this ancient tale of the Táin Bo Chuaillgné, but the fact of which is preserved in the name of the ford at which it was fought, which from that day to the present has been called Ath Firdiadh or Ferdiadh's Ford, now Ardee, in the present county of Louth.

The combat with *Ferdiad*h was not the only occasion on which Cuchulainn had availed himself of the fatal agency of the Gae Bulga, or Belly-Dart, of which he alone is mentioned in our old writings as being master. Concerning this weapon, if we only knew of it from the exaggerated description of the manner in which it tore its way through Ferdiadh's very questionable armour, its existence at all might be very well doubted, as simply an exaggeration introduced for effect in this particular Tale of the Táin Bo Chuaillgné; but in another ancient tale we have, in my belief, very fair authority to show that Cuchulainn had unwittingly killed his own son Conlaech with this very weapon, in an ordinary combat on the shore near Dundalk, and in precisely the same way that Ferdiadh is described to have been killed with it.

Like the Tathlum, or wonderful Sling-Ball, with which the champion Balor was killed in the battle of the northern Magh Tuiredh, the Gae Bulga, or Belly-Dart, has been assigned an eastern and fabulous origin, by some ancient Irish poet whose name and precise time are not known to me. This poem consists of ten stanzas, and the only copy of it that I have ever met is one made about the year 1714 by John Mac Solly, of the county of Meath, a tolerably fair scribe.

LÆCT. XIV.
The "Gae Bulga" of
Cuchulainn.

The poem, the language of which is certainly older than the tenth century, and which has suffered but little by transcriptions, appears to have been written in answer to a question, and runs as follows:—

"How was the Gae-Bulga discovered?

Tell us without being ignorant,—

Or by whom was it brought hither,
From the eastern parts of the world?

"Inform those who are ignorant

That this weapon originally came hither
From Bolg Mac Buain, in the east,
To Cuchulainn, in Muirtheimhné.

"Two monsters that were upon the sea,

Which fought a fierce, angry battle;
Their names, I well remember, were
The Curruid and the Coinchenn.

"Curruid fell in the furious fight

By the noble, fierce Coinchenn;
Upon the boisterous, proud, Red Sea,
On the ridge of the cool and deep abyss.

"Bolg Mac Buain, a champion famed,

Discovered the skull of Curruid upon the strand,
Whither it fled from the sea abroad,
Closely pursued by the Coinchenn.

"Bolg Mac Buain, the renowned,

Many were the hosts whom he defeated;
By him was made the wild spear,
From the bones of the kingly monster.

"Mac Buain gave the Gae Bolg

To Mac Iubar, the brave subducer;
Mac Iubar next consigned the gift
To Lena his own fellow-pupil:

"Lena gave to Dermeil

The spear of hard sharp-pointed head;
And Dermeil gave it, without grudge,
Unto his tutoress, unto Scathach:

"Scathach gave it to [her daughter] Aife,

The "*Gae
Bulga*" of
Cuchulainn.

She never did a more foolish act ;
And by her was made the fatal spear
By which her only son was slain.

"Cuchulainn brought the Gai Bolg
Into Erin, with all its barbs ;
By it he slew Conlaech of the battle-shields,
And Ferdiaidh afterwards, without mistake".

Such, then, is the account of the origin and subsequent history of the famous gai or gae bulga, as preserved in this unique poem ; but from the third line of the last stanza but one, it would appear that the gae bulga brought by Cuchulainn into Erin, was not the original spear, but one made on its model by Aifé, the daughter of his tutoress Scathach, and the mother of his son Conlaech ; and given to him by her on his return to his own country, after finishing his military education with her mother.

The extracts given above have been somewhat lengthy ; but it would have been impossible perhaps to have given a more intelligible account than they embrace of the use of the several weapons alluded to ; and these were some of the principal weapons in use in ancient Erin.

LECTURE XV.

[Delivered, 16th June, 1858.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE; (continued). Examples of Weapons used in the Táin Bo Chuailgné;—the Iron Spear of Cethern;—"Double-bladed" Spears;—the antiquated arms of Iliach;—etc. Shields with sharp rims; "Missive Shields". Story of the death of Sualtann, father of Cuchulainn. Example of a Two-Handed Sword. Of the inscribed Sword of Cuchulainn, of the Gai Buai/neach, (or "Venomed Spear"), of Cormac. Of the Shields used in ancient Erin. The Shield of Corb Mac Ciarain. Early references to Shields. Of the use of the Compasses in engraving devices on Shields. Of the Shield of Aedh Oirghialla. The Sciath. The Shield-strap (Nase), and Shield, of Mac Con. List of celebrated Shields, in the Book of Leinster.

If it were the special purpose of these lectures to make a complete investigation into the subject of the arms and modes of warfare among the early Gaedhils, it would be necessary to translate in the first place, the whole of the historic tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgné. For that remarkable piece is all through full of descriptions, names, and allusions, throwing light upon the details of this subject. But my design at present is only to offer some general account of our ancient weapons and of the use of them, in connection with the general subject of the manners and customs of early civilization in Erin. I do not, therefore, propose to do more than select from ancient authorities a few examples of each kind of weapon, and mode of combat, used by the different races, down to a comparatively late period of our history; taking them in chronological order, but only taking so many of each as may be necessary to mark such changes of form, or such additions to the number of a champion's arms, as from time to time took place. I shall, accordingly, proceed in the first place to instance a few others of the more remarkable among the descriptions and allusions in the Táin Bo Chuailgné; but I shall not further refer to the incidents described in the tale, confining myself merely to noting the passages in which arms and warlike accoutrements are directly referred to.

The first of these to which I have got to refer is that in which an Iron spear is described, as having been borne by a warrior named Cethern. This Cethern was a chieftain of the Rudrician race, of Ulster; and he is stated to have been one of the first of the Ulster champions who came to the assistance of Cuchulainn, when he lay disabled by his many wounds after his desperate combat with Ferdiaidh. In his haste to reach the scene of conflict, Cethern seems to have left home without providing himself with all his weapons. For he is described as having come from the north armed only with a single weapon and that a "Bir", i.e. literally, a Spit of Iron: and this is the first instance of the weapon so called. This word is often applied to a Spear, in the ancient forms of the Gaelic language. The bir was not, however, as may be supposed, the only weapon of so important a warrior; and accordingly the tale proceeds to relate that just as Cethern was slightly recovered from his first wounds in battle against the men of Connacht, his wife arrived from the north with his sword, which had been forgotten by himself in his haste.

Examples of weapons used in the Táin Bo Chuailgné.—The Iron Spear of Cethern.

LECT. XV

"Double-bladed" Spears.

Another species of spear, not hitherto mentioned, now appears on the scene; for, we are told in continuation of the description of Cethern, that scarcely had he retired from the conflict with the enemy, when his father, Finntann, arrived at the scene of action, from Dun-da-Bheann, (on the river Bann), attended by one hundred and fifty men, each armed with a "double-bladed spear", that is, a spear with a blade at each end of the handle, so that it wounded alike with either end. They all fell, however, excepting Finntann himself and his second son Crimthann, who were saved by king Ailill and queen Medbh.

After the defeat of Finntann again came Menn, the son of Salcholga, from the points of the Boyne, with a company of twelve men only, each armed like those who went before them, with a spear having a blade at each end. These twelve were also killed, but Menn himself escaped.

Description of the antiquated arms of Iliach.

A curious description next occurs of the worn-out arms of a champion so old as to have been superannuated at the time of queen Medbh's invasion; but who seems to have been inspired to new vigour by the danger of the province. It is remarkable for the details it contains respecting the materials and construction of the war-chariot, as well as of a chieftain's arms at this early date.

This aged warrior was Iliach the son of Cas, the son of Ros Ruadh, a champion of the clann Rudhraidhé, the royal race of Ulster, whose territory lay on the very northern coast.

When this old warrior heard of the hostile descent made on his native province by the queen of Connacht, he resolved to set out at once to the scene of action, and devote even the last remnant of his life to the honour and security of his people. His two old steeds, says the story, which had been let loose for life, were once more caught and yoked to his old shattered chariot, "which had neither cushions nor skins in it". He slung over his shoulder "his rough, dark shield of iron, with its hard rim of silver"; he girded "his rough, gray-hilted, heavy-striking sword" to his left side. He placed his two "shaky-headed, many-gapped sleghs" (or spears), beside him in his old chariot. His people supplied the chariot around him with stones, and rocks, and great flags, and so he went to the scene of action.

In the battle, the old warrior seems to have recovered the power of youth. For it was not till after he had broken his old spear, and exhausted his heap of stones against his enemies, killing numbers of them, that he retired, barely alive, to the spot where Doche Mac Magach stood, an old Connacht friend of his; and him the wounded old chief requested to cut off his head, since he could now do no more for his country, and begged of him to convey his old broken sword to his friend Laeghairé, another celebrated Ulster warrior, as the last token of his friendship; all of which was accordingly done.

According to the story of the Tain Bo Chuailgne, after Cuchulainn was disabled queen Medbh passed the bounds of the province and ravaged all Ulster, burning down even the extreme northern fortress and royal residence of Dun Sobhairé; [the place now called Dunseverick, near the Giant's Causeway, in Antrim]. She succeeded then in possessing herself of the famous Bull of Cuailgne, the original object of all the war; and with this trophy of victory, she returned with the army of Connacht, in the direction of Athlone.

The Ultonians had, however, by this time quite shaken off their lethargy, and assembling all their forces they pursued the queen, whom they succeeded in overtaking at Clartha (now Clara, near the present town of Mullingar).

Descriptions
in the
*Tain Bo
Chuailgne*.

It is at this stage of the history that occurs one of the most curious passages in the whole tract, as to the arms, dresses, and personal appearance of the princes and warriors of this age.

When Ailill, the husband of queen Medbh, perceives that they are overtaken by the Ultonians, he sends forth Mac Roth, his courier or herald, to observe more closely who are coming; and at the end of each of Mac Roth's observations, he describes the appearance of each party and each chief exactly, in order that Fergus Mac Róigh (the exiled Ulster champion, who was, as will be remembered, with the Connacht army), might identify each to the king and queen.

All these descriptions of the different chieftains are highly picturesque, as well as full of antiquarian and historical interest. Much of them, however, relates rather to the dress and ornaments and the personal bearing of the various individuals described, than to their arms; and the consideration of this part belongs more properly to a future lecture, when I come to treat of the

LECT. XV. costume and domestic life of those ages. This part of the tract is moreover somewhat lengthy, and could not be satisfactorily abridged. I shall, therefore, here, simply extract from it the specific descriptions of the various arms and armour to which it contains allusions, giving them in literal translation, yet without any attempt to connect them together, as in the tale. They will be found to contain clear accounts of many different shields, swords, and spears; and of the latter, some of bronze, and some of iron. And all these descriptions will serve to show how very various were the forms materials and ornaments employed at the time, while yet the nature of the different weapons is exactly similar to that of those with which we are already familiar.

Descriptions
in the
Táin Bo Chualignd.

One of the Ulster chiefs is described by Mac Roth as bearing:

—"A white Shield, with devices of red gold, above him; a long, gold-hilted Sword in one hand, and a Broad-Green Spear (manais lethan-ghlas), in the other".

Of another he says, that he bears:

—"A Spear like the candle of a king's house in his hand, with rings of silver and bands of gold; wonderful are the feats which the spear the champion carries in his hand performs. The rings of silver [seem to] run upon it over the bands of gold at once from its heel to its socket; and the next time it is the bands of gold that [seem to] run over the rings of silver, from the socket to the heel. [He carries a] sharp-rimmed Shield over him; and a Sword with an ivory hilt, overlaid with gold thread, at his left side".

Another bears:

—"A bright Shield, with silver devices, over him; a silver-hilted Sword, in a flaming Scabbard, at his side; a Spear like a column of a king's palace, beside him".

Another has:

—"A curved Shield, with a sharp rim, and rivets, over him; a flesh-seeking Spear in his hand; and an ivory-hilted Sword at his side".

Another again carries:

—"A well-mounted, broad-edged, blood-dripping gae, (heavy-Spear) in his hand".

The next:

—"A wounding, Shadowy Spear at his shoulder; and a black Shield at his shoulder, with a hard rim of white bronze on it; a Sword with an ivory hilt, overlaid with thread of gold, hanging over his clothes outside".

Another bears above him:

—"A round Shield with a hard silver rim all around it; a deep-edged heavy-Spear (gae); and a long light-Spear, (*sleg*h) in his hand; and an ivory-hilted Sword at his left side".

LECT. XV.

Descriptions
in the
Táin Bo
Chualigán.

The next bears:

—"A bright Shield, with devices in red gold, above him; a gold-hilted, long, Sword, at his left side; a long, green-edged heavy-Spear, (gae), together with a sharp, threatening short-Spear (fagha), with hard strings (suaineamain loga), and rivets of white bronze, in his hand".

(This is the second instance of "strings" being attached to Spears; allusion was also made to them, it will be recollected, in the combat of Cuchulainn and Ferdiaidh.)

Another warrior bears:

—"A Shield with devices in gold over him; a hard, firm straight-edged Sword, girt to his side; and a straight-ridged light-Spear (*sleg*h), flaming red in his hand".

Another wears:

—"A long, gold-hilted Sword at his left side; a flesh-seeking light-Spear (*sleg*h), which dazzled the multitude, in his hand".

The two chieftains next described carry:

—"Two bright-hilted Swords, at their girdles; two flesh-seeking or light-Spears, (*sleg*ha), with bright rings of silver, in their hands".

Another warrior bears arms of iron: [for the "gray" spear was, doubtless, of that metal]: he is described as having:

—"A Sword of seven layers of re-melted iron, at one side of his back; a brown Shield over him; a great, gray Spear, with thirty rivets through its socket, in his hand".

The next has:

—"A long Sword at his side; a great trowel Spear (nanais), in his right hand; a gray Shield at his shoulder".

The next:

—"A green Shield above him; and a thin, blue heavy spear (gae), at his shoulder".

Then comes a champion with:

—"A blood-red Shield, with rim and bosses, over him; a Sword with a silver hilt, at his left side; an elbowed or light Spear (*sleg*h), with a golden socket over him".

And another:

—"A Shield with a rim of gold, over him; a Sword with a hilt of gold, at his left side; and a flesh-seeking, gold-shaded [that is, bronze] light-Spear, (*sleg*h) in his hand".

Another again bears:

—"A bright Shield with fastening-hooks of red gold, and a rim and boss of red gold; a small, gold-hilted Sword at his side; and a sharp, light, shadowy Spear above him".

LECT. XV.

Descriptions
in the
Táin Bo
Chuailgne.

Lastly come a group:

—"Armed with blue, shining Spears; yellow, stroke-resisting Shields; gold-hilted, long Swords, at their sides".

There are a great many other similar descriptive passages in the tract; but as already observed I have selected only those which offered some variety worthy of notice, either in the form, the material, or the ornamental work of the different weapons. In these passages the descriptions are not always definite enough to enable us, to determine with perfect certainty, the metal of which the various arms were composed; but sufficient, I think, appears to warrant us in believing that they were of bronze and of iron both. The exact time at which the latter metal became known here, or extensively worked, is a subject worthy of investigation. I have no doubt however that it was well known and much used at a period very much earlier than is generally imagined.

No Axes or slings in the Táin.

It is remarkable that among the various groups of warriors at either side, no one is described as armed with small weapons, with battle-axes, or with slings. In fact the sling does not appear to have ever been a general weapon of warfare in Erin.

Shields with sharp rims,
or edges.—
"missive shields".

Before taking leave for the present of the Táin Bo Chuailgne, I wish to direct attention, a little more closely, to the mention made there of shields with sharp rims or edges, which occurs in several of the passages just quoted.

In the first place, it will be recollected that, in the first day's combat between Cuchulainn and Ferdiaidh, there are eight little "missive shields" enumerated among the missive weapons with which that day's combat was fought. Now these shields must have been metallic ones and with sharp edges; but whether they were thrown horizontally or vertically is not stated. It is probable, however, that they were thrown both ways. That shields were thrown vertically is clearly shewn in the passage, in which it is mentioned that when Cethern Mac Finn, after his cure by the physician Finghin, returns to his assaults on the men of Connacht, and meets Mainé Andoe, one of the sons of king Ailill and queen Medbh, he throws his shield at him, the rim of which as it fell cut through the Connacht warrior, wounding his charioteer, and his horse, and cleaving the chariot itself at the same time.

There is another extraordinary passage relating to a sharp-edged shield, to which no previous reference has been made; that in which the singular death of Cuchulainn's father is recorded. The description is indeed very extravagant, but the passage is important, as indicative of the exact nature of this curious species of shield. LECT. XV.

When Cuchulainn had partially recovered from the effects of his combat with Ferdiaidh, his father, Soaltainn, came to visit and console him. The hero, however, would receive no consolation, but vengeance on the enemies of his province; and knowing that the time had nearly come for king Conchobar and the men of Ulster to recover from the enchanted sleep, (ceasnaidhean,) he determined to send his father to Emania to apprise them of the insulting intrusion of an enemy into their country, and to rouse them to exertion and vengeance. Soaltainn, accordingly, took Cuchulainn's celebrated gray steed, Liath Mhacha, and rode directly to Emania; and when he came to the palace he shouted these words: "Men are wounded; women are captives; cows are driven away; O Ultonians";—but he received no answer, because it was the custom of the Ultonians that they were bound not to speak before their king, and their king was bound not to speak before his druids.

Soaltainn went then to Leac na n-giall, (i.e. the Flagstone of the Hostages), at Emania, and shouted the same words: "Men are wounded; women are captives; cows are driven away".

"Who has wounded; who has captured; who has driven off cows?" said Cathbadh the druid. "Ye have been plundered by Ailill and Medbh", said Soaltainn; "your wives, your children, and your youths, your steeds, your studs, and your flocks have been carried off. Cuchulainn has been fighting and obstructing the great four provinces of Erin, in the gaps, defiles, and passages of the cantred of Muirtheimhné. * * * But he is no longer able to contend with them; and if you do not now avenge your own wrongs, they shall never be avenged".

"It is better to allow the man who offers such combats to a king to come on to death and destruction": said Cathbadh the druid. "All that you say is true", said king Conchobar. "It is true": said all the Ultonians at the same time.

Soaltainn then rushed out in a fury, because he had not received the answer he had expected from the Ultonians.

The Liath Mhacha (Cuchulainn's steed), however, returned with him again to the side of the palace; but in Soaltainn's confusion, his own shield, (says the tale), turned against him, and cut off his head, which fell into the hollow of the shield.

From all the various allusions quoted, and particularly from this last strange story, it is clear that some if not all the shields of the ancient champions had sharp borders, and might have

Story of the death of Soaltainn, the father of Cuchulainn.

LECT. XV.

Example of a
Two-handed
Sword.

been often as we have seen they sometimes were used as well for offence as defence.

There is another remarkable weapon also noticed in the same tract to which special attention may be called. It occurs in a passage in a subsequent part of the tale, after the descriptions of men and arms of which I have been speaking. The passage in question mentions a Two-Handed Sword; or, at least a sword wielded occasionally with both hands. The particular sword spoken of belonged to Fergus Mac Róigh, the Ulster prince who had been exiled into Connacht by king Conor, and who now took part in the final battle of Clartha, (near Mullingar), against his own countrymen.

The immediate cause of the banishment of Fergus was, the death of the sons of Uisneach, at the instigation of Concobar, in violation of Fergus's honour, which had been pledged for their safety; but besides this there was an older ill feeling between Fergus and Concobar, because Fergus had been the rightful heir to the kingdom of Ulster and had actually ruled it for some time until Concobar supplanted him through the ingenuity of his mother, whom Fergus had taken to wife.

Some short time before the battle of Clartha, king Ailill discovered Fergus asleep in a place and under circumstances of pain and insult to him; but not deeming it prudent at the time to have an open quarrel with him, he ordered his servant to remove Fergus's great sword from its scabbard, and to replace it by a wooden one, in order that he might have indisputable proof of the wrong which he had done him. Afterwards when the day of battle came, and king Ailill pressed Fergus to exert himself to the utmost of his power against his countrymen, Fergus answered that he had unaccountably lost his sword, that with it he would hurl destruction on the enemy, but that without it he was quite powerless. Ailill then had the sword brought to him, and he placed it in the hand of Fergus; who on receiving it exclaimed, "Thou art welcome, O Calad-Bolg, sword of Leite!"—[calad bolg literally means, "the hard-bulging".]

Leité, whose sword it appears to have been, was himself a famous warrior of Ulster; and his son, Fergus Mac Leité, who was slain about this time, was equally celebrated with his father. It is stated here that Leité obtained this celebrated sword from some one of the "fairy mansions" of Erin, and that when it was raised for a stroke it expanded to the dimensions of a rainbow in the firmament.

In the heat of the battle, Fergus came up to Concobar and planted three mighty blows on his shield; which shield was called the Ochain, that is, the Groaner, because it emitted a loud groan whenever Concobar was in danger; and all the shields of Ulster groaned in answer to it. But although Fergus planted the three mighty blows on Concobar's shield, yet so bravely did Concobar carry that shield, that the ear of the shield was not even driven so near to his ear as to touch it. "Who is this", said Fergus, "that dares to hold a shield against me this day, when the four provinces of Erin meet in the great battle of the Táin Bo Chuailgne?"

LECT. XV.
Example of a
Two-handed
Sword.

To this question Concobar answered: "A man younger and more accomplished than thou art, and of better father and mother; a man who banished thee from thy country and from thy lands and thy inheritance; a man who sent thee to the haunts of the deer, the hare, and the fox; a man who has not left thee the extent of one step of thy territory or thy lands; a man who has driven thee to accept unmanly subsidy from a woman, (that is, from the queen of Connacht); a man who insulted thee by killing the three sons of Uisneach while under thy protection at one time; a man who will defeat thee this day, in presence of the men of Erin: Concobar, the son of Fachtna Fathach, son of Ross Ruadh, son of Ruadhráidh, high king of Ulster, son of the high king of Erin. And whoever insults thee, now", added Concobar, "thou art not entitled to any fine [eric], for the injury to thy person, or violation of thy honour, because it is in a woman's service that thou art".

"Now, when Fergus heard these insulting words", (says the tale), "he put his 'two hands' to the Calad Boly, and in sweeping round, the edge came in contact with three small hillocks which were immediately at his back; and such was the force of the action, that he cut the three tops off them, and hurled them to a distance into the adjoining swamp, where they remain to this day, as well as the three decapitated trunks, which have ever since been called na trí maela Áidé, or 'the three bald hills of Meath'".

Before passing away from Cuchulainn, the hero of the Táin Bo Chuailgne, it may be worth while to give a short extract relating to his sword, from a legend preserved in the Book of Ballymote, into which it was transcribed at the time of its compilation, in the year 1391, from the more ancient Leabhar na h-Ua Chongbhala, or book of Navan. It is the same which I referred to in a former lecture when alluding to the inscriptions placed within the hilts of ancient swords, by which they were said to tell of their performances, and the names of the champions to whom they belonged. The legend is referred to the time and court of king Cormac Mac Airt, who died A. D. 266;

Of the Inscribed
Sword of
Cuchulainn.

LECT. XV.
Of the inscribed
Sword of
Cuchulainn.

(that is, about as many years after the death of Cuchulainn); and it is not more interesting from the account of Cuchulainn's sword which it contains, than it is in connection with some curious customs of Cormac's time, which are alluded to in it. The story runs thus:

"Cormac" [as chief king] "had the hostages of all Erin in his custody. One of these was Socht the son of Fithal"; [whose genealogy is thus minutely given in the tract: "Socht the son of Fithal, son of Aengus, son of Glangein, son of Seich, son of Socht, son of Fachtua, son of Seanchadh, son of Ailill Ceasdach, son of Rudhraighé, as the book of UaChongbhail says.]"

"Socht had a beautiful sword, with a hilt of gold, pointed with silver, with a golden suspension (or belt), and an ornamented scabbard; it had a sharp point which shone in the night like a candle. If its point were bent back to its hilt it would become straight again like a dart. It would cut a hair on the water; it would chop off a hair on one's head without approaching the skin; it would cleave a man in two, and the one half of him would not miss the other for some time".

(In this poetically exaggerated description, it will be observed that a vivid account is given of the temper and sharpness of the sword-blade; and this is important.)

"He (Socht) said that this was 'the Cruaidin Caidid-cheann', (or "hard, hard-headed"), Cuchulainn's sword; and his family looked upon that sword as an heir-loom of their race, handed down from their fathers before them. Now there was a celebrated court-steward at Tara at this time, whose name was Duibhreann, the son of Uingreann. This steward requested of Socht to sell the sword to him; and he told him that he should have the same meals as himself every night, and that every one of his attendants should have four men's food [every day] in compliment to the sword, and its full value, at his own estimation, besides that. 'Not so'; said Socht; 'I am not competent to sell my father's property as long as he is alive'.

"Things remained so for some time, Duibhreann always talking of the sword: at last he invited Socht, on one occasion, to partake of some pleasant drink with him; and Duibhreann instructed the cup-bearer to ply him well with wine and mead until he became drunk. This was done, accordingly, so that Socht did not know where he was, and so fell asleep. The steward then took the sword from him, and went to the king's Cerd [or worker in precious metals], Connu [was his name]. 'Could you', said he, 'open the hilt of this sword?' 'I could', said the Cerd. So the Cerd then took the sword asunder, and inscribed the name Duibhreann in the shank of it, and fixed the sword again in the same way that it had been before. LECT. XV.

"Things continued so for some time longer; and the steward was still asking the sword, but he could not get it from Socht. The steward then claimed the sword, and went through the legal form of enforcing his claim; and he asserted that it was his own, and that it was from him that it had been taken. Socht declared that the original sword was his by right, as well as its trappings and ornamentation; and he had a Cerd [or artificer] to prove this. He then repaired to his father Fithal, [who was the wisest and most celebrated of king Cormac's judges], to ask his opinion on the case, and to beg of him to come along with him to defend his right to the sword. Of the Inscribed
Sword of
Cuchulainn.

"'I shall not', said Fithal; 'you must yourself sustain your causes, and it is not I that shall ever arbitrate for you, because you prosecute and are prosecutor in too many causes. Speak the truth without falsehood; falsehood shall not be answered by falsehood; but I will go if you fail to prove the ownership of the sword, and it will be the easier for me to cross the proceedings'".

The cause was opened before the monarch in due course, and Socht was allowed to prove that the sword was his; and he made oath that the sword was an heir-loom in his family, and that it was his own. Then the steward said:

"'Good, O King Cormac; the oath which Socht has sworn is a falsehood'. 'Who is to prove for you?' said Cormac, 'that it is a falsehood?' 'This', said he; 'if the sword is mine my name is written in it, and it is concealed in the hilt of the sword'. Socht was then called up by Cormac, who told him what had been said. 'The case is suspended', said Cormac, 'until this is ascertained; and let the Cerd be called before us'. The Cerd came, and ripped open the hilt; and the steward's name was found written in it.

"Socht (then spoke, and) said: 'Ye have heard, O men of Erin, and [king] Cormac along with you, that this man acknowledges that the sword is his. I give up [said he to the steward] its possession along with its liabilities from me to you'. 'I acknowledge, indeed', said the steward, 'its ownership with its liabilities'.

"Socht then said: 'This is the sword that was found in the (headless) trunk of my grandfather; and I know not who it was that committed that deed, even to this day: and do thou, O Cormac, deliver judgment in that case'. 'That is a liability greater [than the value of the sword]', said Cormac. 'There were then seven cumals adjudged by Cormac for that crime,

LECT. XV.

Of the Inscribed
Sword of
Cuchulainn.

[on the steward], and to return the sword back again'. 'I acknowledge', said the steward, 'the history of the sword'; and he then related the whole story of his fraud in order; and the Cerd [or artificer] also told the same story in relation to the sword. Upon this Cormac ordered seven cumals [or twenty-one cows] from the steward, and seven more from the Cerd [or artificer]; and he said: 'It is a profitable injunction that Néré bound (on all; namely), to deliver a just and impartial judgment'.

(The Néré alluded to was himself a judge, and the worthy son of the celebrated judge, Morann, "of the Golden Collar".)

"'True', said Cormac, then; 'this is Cuchulainn's sword; and it was with this sword that my grandfather, Conn of the hundred battles, was killed by the hand of Tibraidhe Tirech; of which it was said:

"With an army of valiant companies,
If the men of Connacht have come,
Alas! to have seen Conn's blood
Upon the sides of Cuchulainn's sword".

"Cormac, then, and Fithal [his judge] gave judgment upon the sword; and it was Cormac that prepared it; and Cormac himself was adjudged the sword, as erie [or fine] for the death by it of his grandfather Conn".

Of this sword it was said, that it could not be withstood in battle, nor the man in whose hand it was carried; and it was one of "the three precious jewels in Erin", which Cormac possessed, namely, his Cup, and his Branch, and this Sword.

This history of Cuchulainn's sword offers a remarkable example of the care with which certain celebrated weapons were preserved, and the respect with which they were regarded among the Gaédhils; and that down to a period but little before Saint Patrick's time. But this is by no means a solitary instance of the kind, as will be seen from the following account of another possession of the same king.

The Gae
Buaifneach, or "Venomed Spear" of
Cormac.

Besides Cuchulainn's famous sword, the Cruaidin Caidid-cheann, or Cataid-cheann, king Cormac possessed another more ancient and not less celebrated weapon, known in ancient writings by various names, but more particularly by the name of the Gae Buaifneach, or "the Venomed Spear". The origin of this spear is very remote, being indeed involved in the history of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

In the course of these lectures we have had occasion, more than once, to mention the name of Lug, or Lugaidh, Mac Eithlenn, the famous chief and king of the Tuatha Dé Danann, who killed his grandfather, Balor "of the evil eye", with a cast from his sling of a ball of the kind called tathlum, at the battle of the second or northern Magh Tuireadh. The name of Lugaidh's father was Cian; and this Cian was murdered by the three sons of Bicrenn, who were of the same race as himself.<sup>(236)</sup>

I.E.O.T. XV.
The Gae
Bualneach, or "Venomed Spear" of
Cormac.

For this murder Lugaidh imposed an eric or fine of compromise on the three young warriors: and the fine which he imposed on them was, to procure for him certain things from foreign countries, which he was satisfied would cost them their lives to get; and amongst these was the famous Spear of Assal, or "Pirris", as others call him, the king of Persia. The youths, however, returned to Erinn with Lugaidh's demands, after many years' travel and dreadful suffering, but so enfeebled that they died after landing on this east coast of Leinster, before they could reach Tara. The sufferings and tragical fate of these young warriors, I may remark, form one of the ancient tales known as the "Three Sorrows of Story-telling"; the other two being, the story of the tragical fate of the children of Uisnech, and that of the Children of Lir.<sup>(237)</sup>

The objects of Lugaidh's demands, however, were safe; and among them was the famous spear, which at the time was called Ibar Alainn Fídh-bhuidhe, (or, "the Yew, the finest of timber"),—perhaps from the shaft being formed out of the yew tree,—though I believe that the ancient spear-handles were generally made of ash.

No farther account of the spear is found from Lugaidh down to Celtchair Mac Uithir, a famous chief and champion of Ulster in the time of Concobar Mac Nessa, whose residence was at Dun Celtchair, (now Downpatrick, in the county of Down). In Celtchair's time the spear was called Luin Cheltchair, that is, Celtchair's Spear; and it is described (in terms of unusual extravagance) both in the Tale of the Túin Bo Chuailgne, and in that of the Bruighean Da Derga.

From a poem on the manner of the deaths of the chief heroes of the Royal Branch, written by Cinnaeth O'Hartigain, who died in the year 975, it is stated that Cumsraith Menn, the son of king Concobar Mac Nessa, was killed with the Luin Cheltchair, by Ceat Mac Magach, a famous Connacht champion; from which circumstance we may infer that the spear had at this time passed, probably in the vicissitudes of warfare, from Ulster into Connacht.

After this we hear nothing more of the Luin Cheltchair, until we find it in the possession of King Cormac, about the year

<sup>(236)</sup> Book of Lecain, fol. 28. a.

<sup>(237)</sup> [The Three Tales have been published in full in the ATLANTIS, vols. iii. iv. (Dublin, 1862-3), in the original, with Translation and notes by Professor O'Curry.]

LECT. XV.
 "The Gae
Buafneach, or "Venomed Spear," of
Cormac.

260, but then under the name of the Crimall, that is, the "Blood-spotted". But in connexion with the history of king Cormac, it is reported to have borne a very prominent part indeed; no less than causing the abdication of one of the ablest and wisest monarchs recorded to have filled the throne of Erin. The following are the circumstances, as preserved in ancient history.

In the time of King Cormac Mac Airt<sup>(238)</sup> there flourished a remarkable champion, of the people called the Desies of Meath, (or Bregia), whose name was Aengus, the son of Art Corb. This champion took upon himself the office of Airé Echta,<sup>(239)</sup> the holder of which, under the Brehon laws, was recognized as one who righted the wrongs of his own tribe against all wrong-doers from without, and maintained the cause of the weak and the poor against all wrongs and oppressions within. Now it happened that on a certain occasion in the performance of his office Aengus had to proceed into Connacht to inflict punishment for some wrong done by the people of that province to his own; and on his return he discovered that his brother's daughter had in his absence been forcibly carried off and abused by Cellach, one of King Cormac's younger sons. On hearing of this outrage he made directly for Tara; but the door-keepers refused him admission until he had put off his arms, as, by an ancient regulation, no armed champion was allowed to enter the palace. Aengus complied with the rule, and entered; but in passing through the hall he perceived the king's favourite spear, the Crimall, resting on its rack. He immediately took down the spear, and passed on into the council chamber, where he saw the king in his chair of state, and his guilty son Cellach sitting behind him.

The moment the enraged champion saw the offender he sent the spear by a single thrust through his heart. Now, "there were three chains attached to the spear", (continues the story), "and three hooks to each chain; and on Aengus pulling back the spear, one of these hooks caught Cormac's eye, and tore it asunder, while at the same time the heel-blade of the spear struck Cormac's high steward on the forehead, and passed out through his skull behind". The champion fled at once from the palace towards his own house, closely pursued by the king's attendants, no less than nine of whom he is said to have killed with the spear himself, escaping finally from the remainder.

From this circumstance, we are told, the Crimall received the name of Gai Buafneach, or "Venomed Spear"; and Aengus

(238) See ante, pp. 18, 58, 212, etc.

(239) See ante, p. 37.

has been ever since known in Irish history as Aengus Gai Buaiſneach, or "Aengus of the Venomed Spear". But after this record the celebrated weapon disappears, so far as I know, from history.

The last mentioned anecdote of the Crimall is especially preserved by our historical writers, because it is connected with the retirement from the throne of so celebrated a king. The loss of his eye by the accident just described occasioned one of those "personal blemishes" which, according to the national law, were held to be inconsistent with the possession of the chief sovereignty; and Cormac accordingly resigned the throne, to devote the remainder of his life to the cultivation of the philosophy of the period, in the honourable retirement of a comparatively humble residence at Alcaill, close to the royal seat of Tara.<sup>(240)</sup>

I have now referred, I believe, to the greater part of the specific information preserved in the early manuscripts relative to the Sword and the Spear. It remains to speak of the structure of the Shield, which almost equalled in variety that of the weapons of offence of which we have been speaking. And I cannot better introduce the subject than by a curious extract from the "Yellow Book of Lecain" (a manuscript of about the year 1390, preserved in Trinity College, Dublin, II. 2. 16), which defines the meaning of the ancient name of this portion of a warrior's arms.

Of the Shields used in ancient
Erinn.

"Lumman was a name for every shield; that is, Leoman (a lion); because there is no shield without the picture of a lion inscribed on it, in order that its hatefulness and its terror might be the greater; because the lion is a furious, combative, fighting animal;—and it was through charms and incantations that this was done".

The tract from which I quote then proceeds to give an account of a particular Shield,—that, namely, of Corb Mac Ciarain, who flourished in the reign of king Art, the father of that Cormac, the cause of whose abdication has just been described.<sup>(241)</sup> This shield had belonged in succession to seven monarchs of Erinn; and it was believed to be a shield against which no force could prevail.

Of the Shield of
Corb Mac
Ciarain.

There was, says my authority, at this time, a certain

<sup>(240)</sup> [Cormac's wound is mentioned in the Ann. IV. Masters, at A.D. 265. His abdication in consequence of it is not stated by these Annalists, who record his death, at Cleitach, the following year, 266.]

<sup>(241)</sup> [Art reigned (according to the Annals of the IV. Masters), from A.D. 166 to 195. His father Conn, "of the Hundred Battles", reigned from 123 to 157.]

LECT. XV. (Leinster) warrior, who was both a poet and a prophet; Ferberna, the son of Regaman, was his name. And this Ferberna composed a poem for Corb, the owner of the shield, and presented it to him; begging of him at the same time to give him the shield. Corb accordingly, unable to refuse the request of a poet, gave him the shield; and his joy and gratitude were boundless. Now, it was just at this time that a battle was on the eve of being fought between the monarch Art, son of Conn, and some marauders from the Hebrides; and the warrior-poet availed himself of so favourable an opportunity to try his newly-acquired shield. He accordingly repaired to the scene of action, (which was at the Hill of Cuarna, near the place now called Garristown, in Meath), and took an active part in the fight; but despite the protection of his gifted shield, he was unfortunate enough to have received no less than one hundred and fifty wounds in the battle. He then returned homewards; but he was so exhausted by the time he reached Tech Straffain (the place now called Straffan, in the county of Kildare), that he died there of his wounds;—"his sharp spear in his hand, his shield slung at his neck, and his sword with its scabbard of brass at his side; and so it was that he died",—says the ancient authority. He had ordered his servant to dig his grave,—“and to bury him with his spear stretched at the one side, his sword at the other, and his shield over him”;—and the place of his grave was ever after called Lunman, from the shield. Unfortunately I cannot identify the spot under any existing name.

Early references to Shields.

The first reference to the making and repairing of shields in ancient Erin, is found in the account of the first Battle of Magh Tuireadh, where the Firbolgs required from the Tuatha Dé Danann time “to make and repair their arms and Shields”, before coming to the fight. In this instance, however, there is no reference to the material of the shield; but we may, I think, presume that it was framed of wood, and that it was covered with leather, or hides, and plates of metal.

We find it stated in the Annals of the Four Masters (A.M. 3817) that the monarch Enna Airgtheach, of the Milesian race, fell in battle this year; and that it was by him that Silver Shields were made, at Airget-Ros, (in the present county of Kilkenny), which he bestowed on the men of Erin, together with horses and chariots. Whether we insist on the truth of this statement, or not, it may be fairly inferred from it that the Gaedhils had among them very ancient traditions that metal shields, or shields covered or adorned with discs, at least, or plates of the precious as well as of other metals, had been known and used in the country from a remote period.* And this tradition is well-sustained by a curious account of a shield made for Cuchulainn. LECT. XV.

The story of this shield is so short that I may give it verbatim. It is wild enough, as usual; but it will be found to contain some curious and valuable details as to the process of manufacture followed by the metal workers of the earliest times.

“There was a law made by the Ultonian knights that they should have Silver Shields made for them, and that the carved device of each should be different from those of all the others.

“Cuchulainn was at this time pursuing his military education at the school of Buanunn and Scathach; and on his return home he found the shields in process of being made. Cuchulainn repaired to the manufacturer, whose name was Mac Engé. ‘Make a shield for me’, said he, ‘and let me not find upon any other shield of the shields of the Ultonians the same carved devices that shall be on it’. ‘I cannot undertake that’, said Mac Engé, ‘because I have exhausted my art on the shields of the Ultonians’.

“‘I swear by my arms (of valour)’, said Cuchulainn, ‘that I shall kill you if you do not make my shield according to my order’. ‘I am under (king) Concobar’s protection before you’, said Mac Engé. ‘I shall violate Concobar’s protection, then’, said he, ‘and shall kill you besides’; and Cuchulainn then repaired to his home.

“Mac Engé was greatly distressed at what happened; and as he was musing over it he saw a man advancing towards him. ‘You are distressed’, said he to Mac Engé. ‘I have cause to be so’, said the shieldmaker; ‘namely, that I am to be killed unless I make Cuchulainn’s shield’.

“The man said to him: ‘Clear out the floor of your workshop, and spread ashes upon its floor, until the ashes are a man’s foot in depth’. It was done according to his directions.

“As Mac Engé was standing, after this, he saw the same man coming over the outer wall to him, with a fork in his hand, and two prongs projecting from it; and he planted one of the prongs in the ashes, and with the other described the devices that were to be engraven on Cuchulainn’s shield. Luaithrindi, [or ‘ashes-engraver’], was the name of this prong; as Dubditha said: ‘Were I Mac Engé, it is so I would engrave’. And Dubhan [the Black] was the name of the Shield”.

This is a fanciful legend enough; but still it could hardly have been altogether an idle invention; and it seems likely enough that the object of the writer was simply to connect with the name of the great champion Cuchulainn the origin of some

Use of the Compasses in engraving devices on a shield.

LECT. XV. remarkable new design in the engraving of shields, and at the same time to mark the (supposed) first application in ancient Erin of the compasses, or two-pronged fork, to secure accuracy in the engraving or casting of ornaments in metal of this kind.

This legend is found in an old vellum manuscript in the Library of Trinity College, Dublin (H. 3.17); but the writer has left us in the dark as to whether the shield was actually cast in the mould formed by the patterned ashes, or whether the pattern traced in the ashes was transferred to or copied on a hammered metal or wooden shield. The former, however, is more consistent with the circumstances, and if so, it would afford a curious instance of the antiquity of the founder's art in this country.

Of the Shield
of Aedh, son of Duach Dubh, king of Oirghiall.

The next reference to the Shield to which I have to direct attention, is important as regards the material employed in making it. That shields were not always wholly of metal, we have perfectly authentic authority, from Dallan Forgaill's celebrated poem on the shield of Aedh, son of Duach Dubh, king of Oirghiall (or Oriell). This poem was written about A.D. 600; and it states that the shield had been made from the timber of a particular tree, namely, of the Eo Rossa, or Yew-tree of Ross, [near Leithghlinn, in the present county of Carlow].

This "Yew of Ross" was one of the great ancient trees, mentioned in our history, blown down by storms about this time, after having stood, as it was believed, from the time of the monarch Conuing Beg-eaglach, a period of about fourteen hundred years.

It can be gathered from Dallan Forgaill's poem that the Shield of the king of Oirghiall had been made in a house underground, by a druid named Eochaidh, who is said to have endowed it with druidical protective properties, which gave it a value and importance that did not attach to ordinary shields.

The Sciath.

The Shield, like the Spear, had various names among the ancient Gaedhils; but Sciath was the most common; and it is a fact not without some interest, that this very name, probably because the particular kind of shield represented by it had become the most general form of the ancient Gaedhelic shield, is still preserved universally in almost every farmer's or peasant's house in Ireland, in connexion with a common household implement, which is framed like the kind of shield no doubt formerly used by the common soldiers at least. I allude to a not less peaceful an article than the sciath, or "scuttle", as it is sometimes Anglicised, in Munster, in which I dare say many of us have often seen potatoes carried to the stream to be washed; an article probably very little if at all different from the ancient sciath used for defensive purposes. The common potato-sciath is a simple construction of stout wicker-work, of an oblong form, about three feet long and nearly two feet wide; having a depth in the centre of about six inches; the oblong not squared or of equal width at both ends, but tapering gradually to its termination, to a rounded and somewhat broad end at the top, and more gradually to a much sharper angle at the lower end. LECT. XV.

The Sciath.

This Sciath is made by first bending a good strong osier hoop to the form just described. To this hoop, at both ends, are lashed, with osier withes, in longitudinal lines, a sufficient number of strong rods to form ribs, bulging out to the required depth, and interwoven across from the sides with strong twigs, so as to form a light, compact, firm piece of wicker-work; which if covered, as the ancient shield was, with one or more layers of raw ox-hide, would offer no inconsiderable resistance to the assaults of the heaviest sword or spear.

It will now be readily understood that when a shield is described as being capacious enough to stow away "a young pig", we need not wonder at it, nor consider it as any very extravagant exaggeration; for I can testify that I myself, as I am sure thousands besides me, have seen children from one to two years old rocked to sleep in one of those modern potato-sciaths, which are probably indeed coarser in make, but are certainly not larger nor probably at all different in shape from the ancient shields.

It appears from various ancient Gaedhelic readings, that the Sciath or shield was in some way strapped to the arm; as we find, for instance, in the account of the combat between the young warrior Conlaech, the son of Cuchulainn, and the great champion Conall Cearnach, that when the former subdued the latter, instead of killing him he led him captive, "with his hands tied", says the story, "with the sciathrach, [i.e. straps], of his Shield".

There is a very extraordinary but very short reference in the Brehon Laws to the Nasc or "strap" of a Shield, and to the Shield itself, of Mac Con, a prince of Munster, who fought the battle of Magh Macruimhé, [near Athenree, in the county of Galway], against Art, the monarch of Erin, in which the latter was slain, in the year of our Lord 191; [or 195,—Ann. IV. Mag.] The Shield Strap, and Shield, of Mac Con.

This curious note runs as follows:

"Mac Con was a famous champion; he was a champion, a king, and the son of a king, and he was also a poet. His shield was always fastened to Mac Con's leg; and the nasc [band] of it was gold; and there were seven chains of red bronze attached to it, [that is, to the band]; and there was a champion at the end of each chain, whose support and obedience were com-

LECT. XV. manded by him when going to battle. When each of them entered on his combat, this band and the seven chains out of it were used to prevent any one of them taking the place of the other, though the one should be more powerful than the other; because [in such a case] they were immediately drawn back. And this nasc [band] could not be taken in pledge".

The last observation refers to a general law, (to which this nasc, as an exception, was, it seems, not subject), touching the seizure of arms for debt. The law of seizure for debt, was peculiar as regarded weapons of warfare, as well as the Knives used on festive occasions. When Knives were seized, they were left two days in the hands of the owners to give them the opportunity of paying or settling the debt;—when Spears were seized, they were left three days;—Swords were left five days;—and "Emblazoned Shields" ten days.

List of celebrated Shields, in the Book of Leinster.

I cannot better conclude this part of my subject than by referring to a very curious extract from the Book of Leinster, which records the names of the more celebrated Shields kept at the royal palace of Emania, in the time of king Concobar Mac Nessa. It is remarkable also as containing an illustration of one phase at least in the social life of the fierce chivalry of the Royal Branch, of which I shall have again to speak on a future occasion. And it is historically important, besides; because this entry forms the chief authority respecting the arrangements of the Courts or Halls of the Champions, which gave name to the most celebrated order of warriors alluded to in our ancient history.

"King Concobar had three houses, namely, the Craebh Ruaidh; and the Teit  Brec; and the Craebh Derg: [that is, the "Royal Branch", or court; and the "Speckled Branch"; and the "Red Branch"]. In the Red Court were kept the skulls [of the enemies], and their spoils and trophies. In the Royal Court sat the kings; that is, it was Ruadh, [or Royal,] because of the kings. In the Speckled Court were kept the Spears, and the Shields, and the Swords; that is, it was speckled from the hilts of golden-hilted swords, and from the glistening of the green spears, with their rings or collars, and their bands of gold and silver; and the scales and borders of the shields, composed of gold and of silver; and from the lustre of the vessels and [drinking] horns, and the flags.

"The reason why they always put their arms away from them into one house, was: at everything harsh they heard [in their dining-hall] if not avenged on the spot, each man of them arose against the other, so that each of them would be assaulting the other with his shield and his head, throughout the house; and hence their arms were taken from them all, into the Teitè Brec. [These were the shields which were hung up] there: king Concobar's Ochain, i.e. Concobar's shield, with its four rims of gold around it; and Cuchulainn's Fabán, [the famous Dubhan already described]; and Conall Cearnach's Lamh-tapaid; and [the lady] Flidas's Ochné; and Furbaidh's 'Red Bordered'; and Causcerad's Coscrach; and Amargin's Ech-tach; and Conderé's Ir; and Nuadat's "Candle"; and Fergus's Leochain; and Dubhthach's Uathach; and Errgé's Lettach; and Mend's Brattach; and Noisé's Luithech; and Laeghairé's Nithach; and Cormac's Croda; and [the poet] Seancad's Sciath-Arglan; and Celtcar's Comla Catha ['gate of Battle'].

LECT. XV.
List of celebrated Shields, in the Book of Leinster.

"Great indeed would be the enumeration of the shields that were there besides these".<sup>(242)</sup>

<sup>(242)</sup> original:—Ṭṛi tigi la Conchobair, édon in Chroeb Ruair, ocúr in Teite bprecc, ocúr in Chroib Deis. Ippin Chroeb-deis no bitir in Chen-nal, ocúr na fúrob. Ippin Chroeb-ruair, imoipin, no bitir naipin, édon ba ruair do no iugairb. Ippin Teite-bprecc, óna, no bitir na gac ocúr na fceit ocúr na clairuib; édon ba bprecc do imoipneoiruib na clairoeb noip-uipin, ocúr do éainnig na nglar-gac, cona muncuib ocúr cona fithib óip ocúr argar, ocúr do lannuib ocúr iméimélluib na fceit vi óip ocúr argar; ocúr do intinopim óna na neipra ocúr na coim ocúr na m-baigleno.

Ippin no beipir a napma naorib in oen tée: Céc ni gais no éluiter main poiripir vigail fap pechetóip, atpaisev cec fap via laplu combio cad oib oc tuarcan a éino ocúr a fceit fop a éeilu retón in taige, combepir a napma uoib uile ipin Teite mbprecc. Ino Ochoin Chon-chobair ant, édon fceit Conchobair; ceirpe imle óip impe; ocúr fabán Conculainn; ocúr lamtapaid Conall Cernais; ocúr ino Ochné Flidair; ocúr ino Oipois fupbaroc; ocúr ino Chorpach Caurpairo; ocúr ino Gécac Amargin; ocúr ino Ip Chonoepe; ocúr in Canoeil nuair; ocúr ino Léocain fepfura; ocúr ino Uatác Dubéais; ocúr ino Lettác Errgi; ocúr in Uatác Mino; ocúr ino Luitéé noipen; ocúr ino Míac Loegair; ocúr in Chrova Chorpais; ocúr in Sciác-arglan Senéara; ocúr in Chomla-Chata Celteair.

moó tuipin, óna, anpoboi do fceitáib ant oléena.—[B. of Leinster; (H. 2. 16; T.C.D.); fol. 69. b. b.]

LECTURE XVI.

[Delivered 22nd June, 1858.]

(V.) WEAPONS OF WARFARE; continued. Continued use of the same Weapons down to the ix. century. Of the Burial of Eoghan Bel, with his "Red Spear". Story of St. Ciaran and Prince Diarmait. A Spear of Honour, one of the emblems of royalty;—account of the cursing of Tara, by St. Ruadan. Story referring to the Sword of Crimthann, and the Shield of Enna, as celebrated weapons. Allusions to Iron and Bronze weapons, in a verse of Dubh-thach, Chief Poet of King Laeghairé, (temp. S. Patrick.) Of the Battle of Dunboly; (A.D. 594);—instance of a combat on horseback by Bran Dubh. Weapons used at the Battle of Magh Rath; (A.D. 634). The "Short Spears" (Gearr) of Congal, and of Conall. Account of the Military array of King Rayhallach, (circa A.D. 640); from an ancient poem. No change in weapons to the time of the Danish invasions, (A.D. 820). Weapons used at the Battle of Clontarf; (A.D. 1014). Account of the Battle, in the "Cogadh Gall ré Gaoidhealib";—"loricas" of the Danes;—descriptions of arms, etc., from this History. Use of the Lochlann, or foreign Battle-Axe. "Straight-backed Swords", of the Dalcassians. Use of Two Swords, (one in each hand), by Murchadh, at the Battle of Clontarf. Account of the Death of Brian; and of the stand of Donnchadh against the Ossorians, at Baile-atha-Aoi.

WE have been occupied so far with such references as can be gathered from history as to the military weapons of ancient Erin, from the earliest days of Firbolgs down to a period approaching that of the introduction of Christianity into the country, with which some more intimate acquaintance with the manners and customs of continental nations may be supposed to have been introduced. Little, if any, alteration, however, appears to have taken place in consequence of the increased communication with other parts of Europe, either in the system of warfare or in the military weapons of the ancient Gaedhils, such as we have found them in the various descriptions and allusions I have collected. The Sword, the Spear, the Javelin, and the Shield appear to have continued still to be the favourite, if not the only, weapons of offence, from the time of the arrival of Saint Patrick, in the year 432, to the Danish invasion, about the year 820, when we first note the use of Battle-Axes, and Bows and Arrows. It would therefore be but mere repetition of what has already been said, to follow the history of military weapons by quoting any further instances in detail from the time of Cormac Mac Airt, in the third century, to that of the Danish Invasion in the ninth. I shall only take a few instances from the history of our own domestic warfare between the introduction of Christianity and the invasion of the Danes, to show that no change appears to have taken place between these periods.

In the Annals of the Four Masters, at A.D. 537, we find it recorded that Eoghan Bel, king of Connacht, was mortally wounded in a battle near the present town of Sligo, by Fergus and Domnall, the kings of Ulster, who had made a plundering expedition into his country. King Eoghan survived the battle a few days; but when he found that his end was drawing near, he ordered a grave to be dug for him in the side of the mount on which his own palace stood, and that he should be buried in it "with his Red Spear in his hand and his face to the north" against his Ulster enemies. The mount on which the grave was opened, in which Eoghan was buried according to his own direction, overlooked the road by which the Ulstermen were accustomed to pass into his territory; and it would seem that the grave must have been left open, as the Ulstermen became so terrified at it that they are stated to have made an incursion into the district afterwards, when, raising the body, they took it away past Sligo to the north, and buried it there with its face down, on the banks of Loch Gilé.

L.F.C.T. XVI.

Instances showing continued use of the same Weapons down to 1x. century.

Of the Burial of Eoghan Bel, with his "Red Spear".

This example proves that the Spear was still, in 537, a century after the time of Saint Patrick, the favourite among the Christian Gaedhils.

In the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 528, it is stated that Tuathal Maelgarbh assumed the monarchy of Erin in this year, to the prejudice of the young prince Diarmait, the son of Fergus Cerrbheól, whom he drove out of Meath, over the Shannon, into Connacht. It happened that it was just at this time that Saint Ciaran came out, from the island in the Shannon in which he had founded his first church, to the mainland of Westmeath, for the purpose of establishing himself on a broader foundation; and just as he was about to set up the first pole on the site on which the famous ruins of Clonmacnoise yet stand, he was joined by the young prince Diarmait and his few attendants, who had landed from their boats, curious to see where Saint Ciaran and his followers would stop. Saint Ciaran, recognizing the prince, invited him to lend his assistance to the setting up of the pole. This prince Diarmait did; and thereupon Saint Ciaran gave him his blessing; and said in addition, that the time for mounting the throne of his ancestors was at hand.

Story of St. Ciaran and Prince Diarmait.

Hardly was the prophecy pronounced, when Diarmait's step-brother, Maelmordha Mac Argatan, having heard the saint's words, and placing implicit confidence in his promise, set off with all speed to where he knew the monarch Tuathal was at the time holding an assembly,—at a place called Grellach Eilti, in the same district. When Tuathal's people saw an armed horseman coming at full speed towards them, they believed him to be a courier coming with news of importance to the king, and they accordingly opened a way for him. On reaching the place where the king was, however, Maelmordha threw himself from his horse, rushed up straight to the king, and plunged his Spear into his breast, killing him on the spot. This daring deed cost Maelmordha his life, as he was pierced we are told with "hundreds of spears" at once, by the attendants of the murdered monarch. Diarmait, however, immediately assumed the monarchy of Erin without opposition, and thus the saint's blessing was fulfilled.

LECT. XVI.

A Spear of Honour one of the emblems of royalty.

In the history of the reign of this king a very curious circumstance indeed is recorded, concerning a Spear of Honour, which seems to have been taken as the ensign of royalty. As the allusion occurs in connection with the quarrel which led to the important historical fact of the desertion of the royal palace of Tara in consequence of Saint Ruadan's curse, I may as well state the substance of the account in full.

Of the cursing of Tara by St. Ruadan.

Strictly administering the laws, as they then stood in Erin, king Diarmait kept up a constant visitation by his great stewards, and Fianns, or standing army, throughout the country, to enforce them. Now, it happened that on one occasion these officers passed into the province of Connacht, preceded by one of the king's heralds,—whose business it was to announce their approach at any noble residence at which they intended to claim the free quarterage due to their official dignity, while engaged in the examination of the state of the district and the administration of the laws, by the king's command. For the mode of proceeding of the royal agents was this: whenever they came to the house of a provincial king or chief, in which they intended to take up their temporary abode, the herald, who carried (we are told) as his insignia of office and authority the monarch's favourite Spear, always approached the door of the residence, holding that famous weapon "horizontally" across his hands; and wherever the door was not wide enough to admit the spear in that position, the herald used to mark the walls at either side to be taken down until the required breadth was obtained; a curious relic of the peculiar sumptuary laws or usages of more ancient times.

The king's stewards and his heralds having gone into Connacht on their tour of inspection, they came to the castle of Aedh Guairé, king of Ui Mainé; (a large district situated partly in the present counties of Galway and Roscommon, and of which the ancient sept of the O'Kellys were chiefs). Here they found that the Royal Spear would not enter "horizontally", and the walls were obliged to be broken down in consequence. But Aedh, the lord of the place, becoming enraged at this, in his anger attacked and slew the king's herald, who carried the spear. LECT. XVI.

When his anger had cooled so far as to see what he had done, knowing the stern disposition of the monarch, Aedh Guairé fled precipitately from his house across the Shannon, taking refuge in Lower Ormond with his cousin, the bishop Senach. The bishop however did not deem himself sufficient protection in such a case; and he accordingly conveyed the fugitive without delay to the more powerful and sacred sanctuary of the celebrated Saint Ruadan of Lothra, [now Lorra], in that district. Saint Ruadan himself felt some uneasiness as to his power of appeasing the king in so serious an affair; and he again conveyed the prince secretly to some friends in Wales, but the king's influence followed him even into that country; and his friends there were forced to send him back to Saint Ruadan.

Diarmait having received information of the return of Aedh, went directly from Tara, with a party of his people, to Lothra, and demanded of Saint Ruadan to deliver him into his hands. This the saint refused to do; whereupon the king took him by force, in violation of the well-established privilege of his saintly sanctuary. Saint Ruadan therefore, accompanied by Saint Brendan of Birr, followed the king to Tara; but Diarmait would not listen to them. And then the two saints went round the hill of Tara, ringing their bells, and cursing it, and prophesying that no king of Erin should ever again reside there. And this was fulfilled; for Diarmait having been soon after murdered in Dal Araidhé, in Ulster, (in consequence, it was believed, of his insult to Saint Ruadan), the succeeding kings of Erin chose to reside in other places; and Tara in fact was abandoned, and was never afterwards occupied as a place of residence.

The immediate value of this historic story to the object of these lectures is of course only to show how important a place the spear continued to hold down to the close of the sixth century, among the military weapons of the country; so important as even to represent symbolically, as in this case, the authority of the monarch.

The next citation I have to make is one chiefly connected, indeed, with the history of the manufacture and use of ordinary household articles; but it contains a curious reference to a celebrated Shield and Sword of more ancient times, apparently preserved and regarded with the highest honour at the comparatively late period to which the history refers. Story referring to the Sword of Crimthann, and the Shield of Eana, as celebrate weapons.

In the year 568, Aedh Mac Ainmiré assumed the monarchy of Erin. Now, it happened that shortly after his accession to the LEOT. XVI.

Story referring to the Sword of Crimthann, and the Shield of Euna, as celebrated weapons.

throne, Cumascach, the youngest of his four sons, obtained his consent to make a princely circuit of visitations to the provincial and chief courts of the kingdom, in accordance with ancient custom. The pleasure of prince Cumascach, however, was by no means that his visits should carry any satisfaction to the residences at which he proposed to make them; but on the contrary, he was resolved that his presence should be as intolerable and as insulting to his entertainers as he could make it.

The first court that he visited was that of Bran Dubh, king of Leinster, at Bealach Conglais, [the place now called Balinglass, in the county of Wicklow]. His character had, however, preceded him. When therefore king Bran heard that so unwelcome a guest was on his way to him, with a numerous and oppressive retinue, he dressed himself in the garb of one of his own domestics, and desired that the prince should be seemingly well received; at the same time that they should tell him that he, Bran, was away in Britain, raising his tribute from that people. The prince and his company arrived in due time at Bran Dubh's court, and where they found a separate spacious hall, fitted up for their reception, and an appropriate repast prepared for them.

While this was going on, there came to Bran Dubh a friend bearing some useful presents, anticipatory, as it would appear, of the events which were to ensue. This friend was no other than Saint Maedhog of Chuain-Mór, [in the county of Carlow]; and the homely presents which he brought to Bran were, a flesh fork and a boiler; but besides these he brought him also a Shield and a Sword; all which the saint showed to the king, whilst he recited the following short poem:

“ Here are presents meet for a king,

O Son of Eochaidh, never-cheerless,—

A fork with carving prongs;

A shield; a sword; and a boiler.

“ The fork, for the purposes of the cooked flesh,

Is a gift becoming a high king;

The boiler, for the boiling of the raw,—

For such our Lord Himself ordained.

“ The Shield, for the front of battle

Against wicked tyrants;

The Sword, to rout the battalions,

Thou mayest have, O son of Eochaidh.

“ Connlaid, Saint Brigid's artificer,—it is not forgotten,—

It was he that made this flesh-fork;

Gressach (the smith) made this boiler,

For the son of Niall, for king Laeghmairé.

LECT. XVI.

Story referring to the Sword of Crimthann, and the Shield of Enna, as celebrated weapons.

- "The Sword of Crimthann, the Shield of Enna,
 From me thou shalt receive;
 The Flesh-fork of Fair Mac-in-Egis;
 And the Boiler of Dubhthach of Dublin.
 " Laeghairé of the mantles gave it [this boiler]
 To Dubhthach the chief poet of Erin;
Dubhthach of overspreading fame gave it
 To Fiach, the son of his sister.
 " Fiach gave it to Dunlaing of his own race;
Dunlaing gave it to Ailill;
Ailill gave it to me afterwards;
 I give it to thee, O Bran Dubh!
 " Good are the gifts which thou receivest,—
 A Flesh-fork; and a strong boiler;
 The Sword of Crimthann who was never vanquished;
 The Shield of Enna, which is all red with blood".
 * * * * *
- "My flesh-fork of three uplifting prongs,
 I have brought hither to Bran of the fierce battles;
 My straight, red, carved boiler,
 I have given to the noble victorious Bran", [etc.].

This curious little poem is to be found in the Book of Leinster, (a manuscript, it will be remembered, compiled before the year 1150); much of the interesting matter it contains is not pertinent to our present purpose, though I shall have to make use of it hereafter; it records however this curious fact of the transmission from generation to generation of the instruments of warfare of distinguished men. It is still more curious that in this instance it should be so saintly a man as Saint Maedhog—[pron. Mogue; not of Ferns, but of Clonmore]—that figures as the preserver of such arms. This Saint Maedhog, however, was himself of the royal race of Leinster.

The shield of Enna was that of Enna Cinniselach, the celebrated king of Leinster, whose son Eochaidh slew the great monarch Niall "of the Nine Hostages", in France, A.D. 405.

Crimthann, whose shield is alluded to, was the other son and successor of Enna. Crimthann was king of Leinster at the coming of Saint Patrick, at whose hands he received baptism at Rath Bhiligh, [in the present county of Carlow]. He continued to be the enemy of the monarch Laeghairé, (who was son of Niall "of the Nine Hostages"), and of his successor Ailill Molt, against whom he fought at the battle of Ocha, near Tara, A.D. 478, where that monarch was killed.

The poet Dubhthach, mentioned in Saint Maedhog's poem, had been chief poet to the monarch Laeghairé, and was the first person who received the Christian faith from Saint Patrick, on

LECT. XVI.

Allusions to Iron and Bronze weapons in a verse of Dubhthach, the Chief Poet of King
Laeghairé, (temp. S.
Patrick.)

his first visit to Tara. I possess a copy of an ancient poem in praise of Crimhthann son of Enna Cinnselach, describing his battles, the authorship of which is ascribed to this Dubhthach, which I believe to be genuine, and in which the following curious verse occurs, in reference to this battle Ocha :

"It was my mantle that was on Crimhthann,

In the Battle of Oché;

My iron lorica, my shield of bronze,—

My children and my friends".<sup>(243)</sup>

It will be perceived that the allusions to an "iron lorica" and a "bronze shield" are as important in reference to the history of arms at the beginning of our Christian era, as they are in testimony of the co-existence of iron and bronze at that, and as I have no doubt an earlier period.

Of the Battle of Dunbolg;
(A.D. 594.)

But to return to Bran Dubh, the king of Leinster, and Comascach, the son of Aedh Mac Ainmiré, monarch of Erin: When Saint Maedhog departed from king Bran, leaving him the presents enumerated above, the latter took an opportunity, in disguise, of closing fast the door of the house in which the monarch's insolent son and his friends were making themselves comfortable; and placing a guard around it, he ignited piles of wood against it on the outside, so that it was soon enveloped in fire. The young prince, however, availed himself of the generosity of his poet, who exchanged clothes with him, and under the universal privilege of inviolability accorded to that garb he was allowed to escape from the flames, but only to be killed by the steward of the neighbouring church of Cill Rannarach, in which he sought sanctuary.

News of the untimely death of his son soon reached the monarch Aedh, at his palace of Ailech, [near Derry]; who without delay raised a powerful force, marched into Leinster, and encamped in the immediate vicinity of Bran Dubh's residence. The general incidents of this encampment and of the battle that ensued, in which the monarch was slain, are outside our present purpose; and it is sufficient to state that the account makes frequent mention of swords, spears, and shields, as well as of "banners" flying from the tops of spears placed at the doors of all the tents of the camp,—this last a very curious entry.

Instance of a combat on horseback, by
Bran Dubh.

There is, however, one incident of a kind unlike most of which we find mention in our ancient writings, I mean an instance of combat on horseback.

When Bran Dubh in the first instance saw the disposition of the monarch and his forces, "he mounted his single horse", we are told, rode up to their line alone, and challenged the best of them to single combat. The challenge was taken up by Blathach, the chief marshal of the monarch of Erin, "who came out mounted on the monarch's favourite steed". This Blathach was one of the most expert champions of his day, and is praised for that he never threw an erring cast of his spear; but, notwithstanding, he was no match for the famous Bran Dubh, who soon overthrew him and cut off his head, with which, as well as the monarch's favourite steed, he returned in triumph to his own people.

<sup>(243)</sup> orig. :—írré mo chímchach nabo im Chrimhthann,—i each Ocha, mo luinech iapainn, mo íciach uma,—mo chney, mo éapac.

The year in which this occurred, and in which the monarch Aedh was slain in the battle of Dunbolg [near Baltinglass], was the year 594.

We now come down a generation or two later, to the battle of Magh Rath; and we find the same weapons still in use.

The battle of Magh Rath, [a place believed to be that now called Moira, in the county of Down], was fought A.D. 634, by Domhnall the monarch of Erin, against Congal Claen, a rebellious prince of Ulster, who passed into Scotland and Britain, and returned with a large number of auxiliaries and mercenaries, to make war on the monarch. An ancient Gaelic tract exists containing a minute and florid account of this battle and its causes. This piece was published in full with an English translation, by the Irish Archaeological Society in the year 1842. To that publication I may once for all refer, without going into an unnecessary account of what will be found in it.

Weapons
used at the Battle of Magh Rath;
(A.D. 634.)

In the controversy between the monarch Domhnall and the prince Congal, the latter reminds the former of the time in which they were both in banishment in Scotland, for disloyalty to the Irish monarch Suibhne Menn; and how Congal was the means of restoring him, not only to his country but to its sovereignty also:

"Thou didst afterwards return to Erin, (said Congal), and I returned along with thee, for I was in exile along with thee. We put into port at Traigh Rudhraidhe, [now the bay of Dundrum, county Down], and there we held a short consultation. And what thou didst say, was, that whoever thou wouldst get to go and betray the king of Erin, thou wouldst be bound to restore his territory to him, whenever thou shouldst become king over Erin. I went on that enterprise, O king, for a promise that my patrimony should be wholly restored to me whenever thou shouldst become monarch of Erin; and I delayed not until I reached Ailech Neid, [Aileach, near Derry] where the king held his residence at the time. The king came out upon the green, surrounded by a great concourse of the men of LECF. XVI. Erinn; and he was playing chess amidst the hosts. And I came into the assembly, passing, without the permission of any one, through the crowds; and I made a thrust of my [short] Spear, (the Gearr Chonaill) which I held in my hand, at the breast of the king, and the stone which was at his back responded to the thrust, and his heart's blood was on the point of the spear, so that he fell dead of it".<sup>(244)</sup>

The "Short Spear" of Gearr of Congal.

This is a very clear reference to a short Spear, as the name "Gearr" Chonaill, that is, "the short spear" of Conall, implies; but though we learn from this that the weapon was short, and that the king was struck with it directly from the hand, still we have no means of determining its precise form.

The "Short Spear" of Conall, the son of Baedan.

There is, in another passage of the same tale,<sup>(245)</sup> another reference; but it makes no nearer approach to an exact description of the "short spear". When the monarch Domhnall had collected his forces to Magh Rath, he exhorted his northern friends and relatives to prove their valour in his behalf, in words that seemed to express his doubts of their fidelity and bravery; and the story says that:

"To whomsoever this speech of the monarch appeared superfluous, a haughty, fierce-faced northman from the northern part of the protecting battalion of (Tir) Chonaill, became enraged at the verbal exhortation and lordly instructions of the monarch, the grandson of Ainmiré; his name was Conall the son of Baedan, who was the son of Ninné, from Tulach Dathi and the high-cliffed shore of Tory, in the north; for he did not like to be exhorted at all, and he did not like to be excited; so he poised his 'black-darting spear', and sent a cast of it spitefully and suddenly at the grandson of Ainmiré, (the king). But three select, lordly chieftains from the middle of the defensive battalion of (Tir) Chonaill, namely Mainé, Enna, and Airnelach, (observing his design) sprang before the king, and between him and the cast, and raised their three great hard shields before the king and between him and the cast; but, however, the short spear of Conall passed through the three shields, one after another, and through the red-backed shield of the king himself, until it passed into the ground between the feet of the monarch of Erinn".

Account of the military array of King Raghallach; (circa A.D. 640); from an ancient poem.

It is drily recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 645, that Raghallach the son of Uathach, king of Connacht, was killed on a Sunday, by Maelbrighdé the son of Mothlachan. The circumstances of the murder are not there recorded, but are elsewhere preserved. The king being out hunting, pierced a large buck with his spear, and then followed him into a bog where some men were engaged in cutting turf. These men had finished the buck before the king came up; and on his demanding what he deemed to be his lawful game, they set upon himself and killed him also with their ignoble spades. King Raghallach's family poet, Fintan, wrote a poem on his royal master's ignominious death, in which he recounts the chief exploits of his life and reign; and as this singular poem gives an undoubtedly correct illustration of military array, in the middle of the seventh century, I venture to give here a few verses of it, from a fine copy in my own possession.

<sup>(244)</sup> The Banquet of Dun na n-gedh, and the Battle of Magh Rath; edited by John O'Donovan, for the Irish Archaeological Society. Dublin, 1842 (p. 35.)

<sup>(245)</sup> Ib., p. 153.

LECT. XVI.
Account of the military array of king
Raghallach;
(circa A.D.
640); from an ancient poem.

According to this poem Muirenn was the name of Raghallach's wife; and he had three sons, Fergus, Cellach, and Cathal; the latter of whom, at the time of his father's death, was a divinity student at Clonard; a situation which, however, did not deter him from taking signal vengeance on the murderers of his father. After enumerating several battles gained by king Raghallach, Fintan proceeds to describe an event which took place during his reign, on an occasion when Nindé, prince and lord of Tir-Chonail, made a predatory incursion into Connacht, at the time that the king and queen and their sons, with the assembled nobles of the province, were holding the ancient games of Lughnasad or Lammás, (on the 1st of August), on the sporting green of the palace of Cruachan.

" Raghallach, on Lammas-Day,

Cellach, and Fergus the choleric,

And Muirenn Mael, with her necklaces,

Were preparing for the Games of Cruachan.

" When came Nindé the vindictive,

The son of the plundering Duach son of Conall,

With Fraechan, son of Sanasan;

And they burned all before them to Ceis Corann.

" We perceived the conflagrations;

They moved not in quiet progress;—

The land was filled with burnings

From Sliabh Gamh to Sith Seaghsa, ["the Curlews"].

" Raghallach said unto us,

It is the Clanna Neill that perpetrate this treachery;

If we do not haste to the rescue,

They will slip away from us over Ath Seannaigh; [Bally-Shannon].

" We mustered from the horses of the Fair

Ten hundred bridle-steeds in rank;

The sons of warriors and of noble farmers

LECT. XVI.

Account of the military array of king
Raghallach;
(circa A.D.
640); from an ancient
poem.

Of the race of Brian Mac Echach.

- "Ten hundred well trained sons of chiefs,
With Cellach; many were their achievements;
This was the number of his household,
Who accompanied him on his expeditions:—
- "There were of the household troops with Raghallach
Ten hundred champions, with their shields;
The front of battle they always held;
Theirs was the first Spear in the conflict.
- "Smoothly did they prepare their light-Spears [sleghe]
Because their captains were severe;
High was the anger of their men;
Their heavy-Spears [craisech] were not shaky-headed.
- "The order of our march was,
With a shield (sdarga) on the shoulder of each Gaedhil;
Our Spears in our own hands,
And no servant [gilla] to carry any man's arms.
- "Raghallach's kingly shield
In his white hand inciting us;
His two heavy-spears [Craisechs] of equal length,
In his hand, to rescue the prey.
- "Into the Corrsliabh ["Curlews"] we went,
Passing by Ceis, the first day of autumn,—
Into Corann straight after them,
In three bands, not very great.
- "To us their numbers seemed immense,
The clans of Conall and of Eoghan;
But Raghallach said unto us,
'Give them the battle bravely!'
- "To the call of their trumpets they mustered Seven battalions,—who does not know it?
With captives, pledges, and plunders,
The van of their host reached Sligeach, [Sligo.]
- "Cellach advanced to check them Until the full tide had filled in;
Ten hundred heads of the Conallians,
Was their loss ere they reached Eas-darria, [Balasadare.]
- "The defeat of the flood we gave
To Ninné and his shouting hosts;
We changed the name of the cold cataract;
From thenceforth it is called Martra.
- "The preys were turned back,
From the Clanna Neill by the strength of hosts;
There was scarcely of them, on that night,
A cow that was not in its own buailidh.

"Numerous were we on that night:

Joyful was our assembly;

Were it not for the numbers of the biers,

Beautiful would have been our return.

"Though our losses were numerous,

We did not miss them in our pride;

On the steeds of the men of Tír Eoghain

We performed the games of Cruachan".

It is remarkable that this poet speaks only of shields, Sleghs, (or light Spears), and Craisechs (or heavy Spears), without any mention whatever of swords, axes, or of smaller weapons. Enough, however, appears to show that in Raghallach's time the very arms were still in use which his ancestors had used two thousand years before him, and so they continued down to the Danish wars.

It will be easy to continue a list of examples of the military weapons of this middle age, from the time of Raghallach, in the middle of the seventh century, (that is, A.D. 645,) down to the invasion of the country by the northern robbers commonly called the Danes, which happened about A.D. 820; but, as absolutely no change appears to have taken place in either the mode of warfare or the implements of war in the country in this interval, it is unnecessary to cite passages in mere repetition of what has been already quoted.

No change in weapons to the time of the Danish invasion (A.D. 820) *

Nor can we say with certainty what were the arms of the Danes themselves at this time, as their own antiquarians are doubtful whether that rude people were acquainted with the use of iron even at that late period. But however this may be true of their country in general, still there can be little doubt but that professional warriors who came here after many hostile visits to the more southern countries of Europe could not have failed to make themselves acquainted with the fashion and materials of the weapons of those countries, and that at their coming here, they came armed, if not wholly, at least to a great extent with arms and armour of steel or iron. Be this, however, as it may, we have no account, as far as I know, of what the precise character of their weapons was, down to the battle of Clontarf, which was fought in the year 1014.

No account of the weapons of the Danes before Clontarf.

Of the arms, and of the use of armour described in the accounts of the various contests between the Gaedhils and the Danish invaders, perhaps the examples supplied by the history of the battle of Clontarf will serve to give a complete account, without risking too frequent repetition by following the various descriptions of these contests in chronological order, through so many centuries. And even at Clontarf the mode of fighting

Of the weapons used at the Battle of Clontarf, (A.D. 1014.)

LECT. XVI.

Account of the Battle in the History
called Cogadh Gall re Gaoidhealib.

is but little changed from that of the primitive ages of the Firbolgs and Tuatha Dé Danann.

Of the weapons used at this battle, there is indeed little, after all, to be said. Both parties, Gaedhil and foreigners, are represented as having been armed alike. The best account of their respective weapons, as well as of the details of this decisive battle itself, is preserved in the tract now so well known as Cogadh Gall re Gaoidhealib,—that is “the Wars of the Foreigners with the Gaedhil”; a history popularly known by the name of “the Danish Wars”;—and perhaps the best use I can make of it here is, to abstract the whole description pretty freely, especially as this is the last battle to which I shall, at present, claim attention here.

In the year 1002, Brian Boromha, who had some years before succeeded his father as hereditary king of Munster, finding, or pretending to find, that the monarch of all Erin, Mael-seachlainn [or Malachy] the Second, though personally a just and brave man, had from supineness or some other cause ceased to inspire with the necessary respect for the central supreme power the foreigners of the Danish settlement at Dublin, and certain turbulent native chiefs who were but too ready to combine with them, compelled him to resign the supreme authority to himself. Maelseachlainn accordingly submitted to the authority of the abler and more powerful Brian, and retired to administer his own hereditary kingdom of Meath, without further meddling with the sovereignty of the whole island.

In the early part of the year 1014, the dethroned monarch, acting as king of Meath alone, complained to Brian that the foreigners of Dublin and some of their Leinster allies had entered and ravaged his kingdom; and he acknowledged his inability, with the limited powers at his command, to make head against them and protect his property and his people, without the assistance of the chief monarch. Brian did not hesitate a moment, upon receiving tidings of the distress of the king of Meath, but raising a large force, marched at once to Dublin, where he encamped [at Kilmainham], about the 17th of March (Saint Patrick's Festival), in the year 1014.

When the foreigners heard of his preparations, they sent heralds in all directions to invite and collect auxiliaries for them, to give him battle; and amongst others they invited hither the earls Brodar and Amlaff, the sons of the king of Lochland, and the leaders and retainers of all the piratical bands of the west of Europe, whom they endeavoured to assemble in overpowering numbers, to strike, if possible, a final blow, and to reduce all Erin beneath their yoke.

"In the following of these two princes" (says the curious tract LECT. XVI. from which I quote) "came also two thousand cruel, hard-hearted, branded Danes, the mercenary instruments of piracy, plunder, and murder in the hands of any one who chose to purchase their infamous service. Now, there was not a single branded Dane of these two thousand without a polished, strong, highly-carved, shining "lorica"-of re-melted iron, or cold rustless brass, to cover their sides and their bodies from their heads to the soles of their feet.

Steel loricas of the Danes.

"They invited to them also Sigraill Mac Lotar, earl of Orkney and the neighbouring islands, with the whole muster of the fierce, barbarous, maniac, unrestrainable hordes of the islands of Orkney, Skye, Lewis, Cat, and Man; and two barons from Cornwall. They invited to them, too, Carlus and Ebrie, the two sons of the king of France; and Plait, the brave champion of Lochland. All these foreigners crowded from their respective places to Dublin, where there was an immense host of men collected before them, amounting to three great and powerful battalions, to which were added the entire muster of the men of Leinster, under the traitor king Maelmordha, the son of Murchadh, and father-in-law of Brian".

On the other side, Brian found himself at the head of the men of north and south Munster, a large body of the men of Connacht, and the men of Meath; but these latter were not, as he believed, faithful; and their subsequent desertion of his cause in the hour of danger justified his belief.

The following passages will sound strange to the modern ear. The extravagant use of descriptive adjectives will seem contrary to good sense as well as good taste. The style is, however, that of the fashion of the period; and faulty as it may now seem, it is for the present purpose not to be carelessly condemned, since the very adjectives used will be found to supply the place of long and detailed description:—

"The battle having become inevitable, there stood on the one side the active, vigorous, valorous, fierce, restless, unrestrainable, [etc.] host of the audacious, hard-hearted, inhospitable Danes, and of the blue-green infidel Galls (foreigners), without mercy or reverence, without recognition or sanctuary to God or man.

Descriptions
of arms, etc.,
from the ancient History of the Battle.

"They had with them, to maintain battle and combat, long, keen, bloody, reddened, barbed, sharp, bitter, wounding, fearful, galling, dangerous, heroic, poisonous, Darts; which had been tempered and browned in the blood of dragons and toads, and water-adders and others, and various venomous serpents besides; to be thrown and cast at champions of battle and combat. They had besides bulging, conspicuous, barbarous Arrows, and smooth, neatly-finished, yellow Bows, and fearful, broad-green laighins [heavy Spears], sharp, rough, and dark, in the valiant, bold, cruel hands of these-branded [robbers]. They had also beautifully-ornamented, smooth, dazzling Helmets; and polished, strong, supple, firm, engraved, heavy, firm, secure 'Loricas' of re-melted iron, or of cool, rustless brass, to protect their bodies, and sides, and heads from the sharp, dangerous arms and weapons of battle. They had also brave, heroic, heavy, force-striking, stout, powerful, strong Swords; beautiful Shields; and dazzling, bright, strong Axes".

LECT. XVI.

The Dalcassians (that is, the followers of Brian) and their auxiliaries, were armed with "beautiful, well-riveted, poisonous (i.e. piercing) Spears (*sleg*h), mounted on beautiful handles of white hazel; and great, sharp-pointed Lances (bir), with beautiful silken strings, so that they were like a shower of bright whistling nails, when cast at chiefs of valour and combat. They wore their long, shining, elegant, graceful, white, well-fitting shirts, with splendid, many-coloured frocks. They had heroic, bright, many-coloured Shields, with Bosses of 'red bronze', and beautiful Chains of 'white bronze'. They had on their heads crested, gold-emblazoned Helmets, set with pure crystal gems and precious stones. They had heavy, shining, powerful, stunning, sharp, dazzling, broad, ready, Lochlann Axes, in the hands of chiefs and leaders, heroes and brave champions, with which to strike down and cleave armour and helmets. And they had hard, straight, beautiful, ornamented, smooth, polished, bright-bladed, sharp, blue-green, flaming Swords; in the white right hands of chiefs, and kings, and champions, to cut and hack, to wound and slaughter, the sides, bodies, and heads of their enemies".

Use of the Lochlann, or foreign Battle-Axe.

At first sight it would seem, from this description of the arms of both the parties in this celebrated battle; that the Gaedhils were armed with Lochlann or foreign battle-axes like those of the foreigners themselves. This, however, appears not to be so, for this reason, that in the details of the battle, though there are references to battle-axes in the hands of the foreigners, there is no reference whatever to their use by the Gaedhils. This will be clearly seen in some passages taken from the description of the separate battle which took place between the two thousand mail-clad Danish veterans and the Dalcassians alone.

The description of the day proceeds to tell how the order of battle was now arranged; and how the Danish commanders and their traitorous Leinster auxiliaries gave the front of the battle to those foreign captains already mentioned. [The description of the Danish array follows.] The tract then goes on to state that Brian now drew up his men face to face with his terrible foes; and the front of the battle, (in accordance with a well-known ancient right), was assigned to "the lively, fierce, brave, irresistible Dalcassian clans", Brian's own friends and relatives. The leadership of these celebrated clans was assigned to "the Hector of Erin"; namely Murchadh, Brian's eldest son and heir, then in his sixty-third year, the most distinguished champion among all the Gaedhil of his time, if we may believe the annals of the country, for, according to these, there was no man of his time capable of holding a Shield against him in battle.

LECT. XVI.
Use of the Lochlann,
or foreign Battle-Axe.

Murchadh was attended by his own son Torlogh, the best youth of fifteen years then in Erin; and Conaing, the son of Donnucan; and Niall O'Cuinn, Lord of Inehiquin, [an ancestor of the present earl of Dunraven]; and Eochaidh, the son of Dunadach; and Cudiuligh the son of Cennedigh [Kennedy]; and these last three champions were Brian's own rear-guard in all his battles; and along with these stood Domhnall the son of Diarmait, king of Corca Baiscen, supported by the noblest and best men of the Dalcassian race. [The description of the remainder of the Irish array follows.]

When the arrangements of the battle had been finished at both sides, a rather singular circumstance occurred. On the previous evening a dispute happened between Plait the son of the king of Lochland, the chief hero of the foreigners, and Domhnall Mac Eimhin, the Mór Maer or Great Steward of Scotland, who had come over specially to give his aid to Brian. The dispute ended in an engagement of combat in the morning. And as both sides were ready for the attack, Plait sprang out from the ranks of his own people, and shouted "Where is Domhnall? where is Domhnall?" "Here", said Domhnall. So they advanced towards each other, and each attacked the other with equal fury until both fell and expired together, and when taken up next day, they were found each "holding the other by the hair of the head, and the sword of either plunged through the heart of the other".

On seeing the two warriors lying dead between them, the front ranks of the foreigners and of the men of Munster rushed over their dead bodies at each other; and the historian, after attempting to compare the shock of meeting of the two forces with the wars of the elements or the terrors of the last Judgment, says:

"To all these might I compare the fulminating, fierce, barbarous, distinct blows on the beautiful, deep-bordered, brown-radiating, starry Shields of the Clann Luigdech, [that is, the

LECT. XVI.

Dalcassians] under the stout, shining Axes (or hatchets) of the Danes and pirates, in shattering and crushing them; and on the other hand, the gleaming, bright descent of the hard, straight-backed Swords of the Dalcassians, reverberating hardly and powerfully on the supple, bright, carved, stout, strong, secure 'Loricas' of the Danish foreigners, shattering their bones and their skulls along with them".

"Straight-backed"
Swords of the Dalcassians.

Use of Two Swords, (one in each hand), by Murchadh.

If the Dalcassians had been armed with the Axe at all, this would have been the very place where we might expect to find it so stated; but here they seem to be actually distinguished from the Danes by the use of the "straight-backed sword" alone.

The weapon used by the hero Murchadh, the eldest son of Brian, was the Sword; or rather indeed he used two swords at the same time, one in each hand,—for we are told that "he grasped two Swords, one in each hand, and rushing through the hostile ranks like a wild and infuriated 'Ox', or like an enraged Lion which had been robbed of his whelps, he made a breach as if by an hundred men, through the valiant and compact line";—and even "his enemies after him" (that is the Leinster and Danish writers), the historian tells us, bear evidence, that "fifty men fell at his right and fifty on his left, in that fearful rush; and that he did not deal a second blow to any one; and that neither shield, nor coat of mail, nor helmet afforded protection against any one of his blows, but that through them he wounded the bodies and clove the skulls of his enemies".

And an extraordinary instance of performance with two Swords is mentioned in a subsequent passage, in which is described with some extravagance of language a wonderful feat of strength in Murchadh's combat with Sitric, the Danish earl of Orkney, a champion clothed in complete armour. For the Dalcassian prince is related to have rushed upon his formidable enemy "with a sword in each hand"; and he is stated to have cut off the head and the legs of the Dane at the same moment, with the two swords.

In the account of Murchadh's final combat, with "Ebric, the son of the king of Lochland", he is also described as fighting with the sword alone; but he wore a dagger, or short sword, in addition, for in the last struggle it was with this weapon that his antagonist, who succeeded in snatching it from his belt, despatched the hero.

Account of the death of King Brian.

The account of the death of king Brian himself likewise mentions the Sword as his only weapon. It runs as follows:

About the time of the final defeat and dispersion of the Danes, an attendant reported to Brian, who watched the battle from a little distance, his great age having induced him to leave it to his son to command in the field), "that he saw three naked men running towards them". But Brian said, "they are not naked men, but they are a part of the mail-coated battalion";—and this was, indeed, true, for the party consisted of the great Danish champion earl Brodar and two other warriors. Brian immediately started to his feet, and "drew his sword". But Brodar passed without noticing him. However, one of his two companions, who had been formerly in Brian's pay, called out in the Danish language, "king, king!" "No, no", said Brodar, "priest, priest". "Not at all", said the same man, "it is the chief king himself that we have here". And then Brodar turned about, "with a bright double-edged (or double-headed) battle-axe in his hand"; and "when Brian saw this, he dealt him a blow of his sword, by which he cut off the warrior's left leg at the knee, and the right at the ankle". The Dane at falling, however, inflicted on Brian a tremendous blow with his axe which clove his skull in two. This was the last event of the great Battle.

I shall conclude this part of my subject with one more example taken from the history of this period, and as it offers more than one trait of military manners in the heroic age of Brian, I may be excused for relating the whole passage.

After the melancholy death of Brian, and of Murchadh his eldest son, with the flower of their forces, at Clontarf, Donnchadh, Brian's second surviving son, collected the shattered remains of the Dalcassian clans, "not leaving behind him a single man who had any signs of life in him": and with these he proceeded on his way home, without any molestation from Dane or Leinsterman, until he reached the place now called Athy, [Bailé-atha-Aoi, i.e., the town of the Ford of Ae], on the river Bearba, [now called Barrow, in the co. Kildare]. Here, however, he received a message from Donnchadh Mac Gilla Padraice, king of Ossory, who, with all his people was posted on a hill in the neighbourhood, calling on him to give up hostages of submission to him as a condition of permitting him to pass by that way towards his own country, or else prepare to give him battle.

Of the stand
of Donnchadh
against the Ossorians, at *Bailé-atha-
Aoi*.

To this insolent demand Donnchadh the son of Brian answered, that, if he were trusting to only one servant in the world to support his cause, he would not refuse a challenge of battle from Mac Gilla Padraice and the men of Ossory. Then he ordered a third of his sound or partially sound men to take charge and guard of the disabled victims of Clontarf, and the other two-thirds to give battle to Mac Gilla Padraice. But "when

LECT. XVI.

Of the stand
of Donnchadh
against the Ossorians, at Baile-atha-
Aoi.

the wounded men heard this, they started up so suddenly that their wounds and cuts which had been closed and bandaged burst open". However "they stuffed them with the moss of the field", grasped their spears and their swords, and in this ghastly array took their place with their friends. They requested of Brian's son to send men into the neighbouring wood, to cut down and bring out strong stakes to be fixed in the ground; and said they: "Let us be tied to them, with our arms in our hands; and let our sons and our friends be placed beside us; that is, two sound men, one at each side of each wounded man of us; so that our action may be the more cordial and ardent together; for surely, said they, the sound man will not leave his post until the wounded tied man of us leaves his post".

This was done, accordingly; and when the men of Ossory saw the order into which the Dalcassians had put themselves, disgust and terror seized on them: "and what they said was: It is not an attempt to retreat; it is not fear or terror the Dalcassians seem disposed to exhibit, they said, but they have formed themselves into a close, compact battalion; and for that reason, said they, we will not give them battle, because they are prepared alike for life or for death".—And so notwithstanding all the remonstrances of Mac Gilla Padraice, nothing could persuade the men of Ossory to attack the desperate battalion; and the remnant of the Dalcassian clans were allowed to make the best of their weary way back to their native province. It is recorded of these, however, that no less than one hundred and fifty of the wounded heroes died of the effects of their sudden burst of anger and ardour on this occasion.

LECTURE XVII.

[Delivered 25th June, 1858.]

(VI.) MILITARY EDUCATION. Keting's account of the Fianna Eireann. O'Flaherty's allusion to a Military School under Cormac Mac Airt. Ancient System of Fosterage explained. Education of boys and girls in ancient Erin. First Historical allusion to a Military Teacher, in the account of the Battle of Móin Trogidhe, (B.C. 1000). Of Trogaidhe. Of Cimbaeth, (A.M. 4480); the head of the champions of the "Royal Branch". Instances of the system of Fosterage, under Eochaidh Bé. The Champions of the "Royal Branch". Of the "Gamannrians"; and the Clanna Deaghaidh. Accounts of Cuchulainn, in the Tale of the Táin Bo Cuailgne. Of the Early Education of Cuchulainn; (his boyish feats). Early training of young warriors at this time. Of the later Education in arms of Cuchulainn, (in Alba,—Scotland). List of the "Feats of Championship", learned by Cuchulainn, in the School of Scathach.

IN the last six Lectures I have endeavoured to state the substance of what is recorded as to the fashion, the material, and the manner of use, of the various offensive and defensive Weapons of Warfare in ancient Erin, from the period of our earliest historical references down to the battle of Clontarf, fought in the year 1014. Such an inquiry should properly be considered, however, only as preliminary to the discussion of the system of MILITARY EDUCATION of the ancient Gaedhils, as far as it can be gathered from the same sources. And here I have to express my regret that there is less of direct information on this subject to be found amongst the wreck of ancient national records which have come down to us, than could be wished; and that much of what has been confidently taken for granted by a certain class of "historians", who prefer the pleasure of eloquent expatiation on our ancient military glory to the trouble of investigating what history really assures to us, belongs to the domain not of fact, but of mere assumption. So far as I can testify to the contents of the very large body of Irish MSS. which I have closely examined, including all the old MSS. in the Royal Irish Academy, in Trinity College, Dublin, and in the British Museum, as well as most of those in the Burgundian Library at Brussels, and to some extent those at Oxford, and so far as I know of the contents of those at Rome and Edinburgh, I am sorry to say that they do not contain, I believe, any reference to the existence at any time of any regular general school or college of Military Education in ancient Erin. Some authorities there are, however, on the subject.

LECT. XVII.

Keting's account of the Fianna Eireann.

The Rev. Dr. Geoffrey Keting, in his valuable historical abstract of ancient Gaedhelic History,—a work compiled about the year 1630, from various ancient books then existing, but now lost,—gives us, and doubtless on ancient authority, a very precise sketch (and one in itself in all probability true) of the military education, mental and physical, of the famous Militia of the Third Century, commonly called the Fianna Eireann, who obtained such lasting fame under the command of the celebrated Finn Mac Cumhaill, a warrior who was not, it will be remembered, a mere soldier either, but skilled in what may be called the accomplishments of the educated classes of his time,—a Druid, a Poet, and a Scholar.<sup>(246)</sup>

O'Flaherty's allusion to a Military School under Cormac Mac Airt.

Again, the learned Roderick O'Flaherty, in that passage of his Ogygia, (Part iii.) already quoted,<sup>(247)</sup> in which he speaks of Cormac Mac Airt, (who flourished in the middle of the Third Century,) alludes to a school of the Art of War as one of the Three great Schools instituted by that enlightened monarch.

It is very unfortunate, and among other things for the purpose of our present inquiry, that the important poem referred to by O'Flaherty in this passage is not to be found in any of the MS. collections available to us; it is only known to exist among those locked up in England in the custody of Lord Ashburnham, by whom Irish scholars are not permitted to examine treasures which properly belong to our own people, but the legal ownership of which is at present unhappily vested in a stranger unsympathising alike with our pursuits as Irishmen and with those of the literary world at large. In this poem there is probably much calculated to throw light on the subject of education in ancient Erinn, though O'Flaherty had no occasion to refer more closely to it in reference to the object of his work.

In the absence, therefore, of this poem of O'Duvedan's, and of the original authorities used by Keting, we are thrown back upon the only sources of information on the subject here within our reach, namely, the references met with from time to time in so many MSS. to private or individual military instruction; references which frequently occur in the old books, and which after all probably represent accurately enough the general system of education in which the peculiarly favoured schools alluded to by O'Flaherty and Keting formed but remarkable exceptions in the history of ancient Erinn.

<sup>(246)</sup> See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc.; p. 300, etc.. And see Keating's History of Ireland, (translated by John O'Mahony); New York, 1857; pp. 343, 347, et seq.

<sup>(247)</sup> See ante, p. 58.

We may premise at the outset, that a system of fosterage, LECT. XVII.
Ancient
system of Fosterage
explained. governed by accurately defined laws, prevailed universally in Erinn from the remotest period of her history; a system, indeed, which in many of its features continued to prevail even down so late as to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. And we have ample proofs that this fosterage was not a mere indiscriminate custom among all classes of the people, nor in any case one merely confined to the bare physical nurture and rearing of the child which in early infancy was committed to the care of a nurse and her husband; but that the fosterhood was generally that of a whole family or tribe; and that in very many cases it became a bond of friendship and alliance between two or more tribes and even provinces. In those cases the fosterers were not of the common class, poor people glad to perform their nursing for mere pay, and whose care extended to the physical rearing only. On the contrary, it is even a question, and one not easily settled, whether the term nursing in the modern acceptation of the word, should be applied at all to the old Gaedhelic fosterage, and whether the term pupilage would not be more appropriate. As the present, however, is not the time to go into this very curious subject, I must content myself with stating as a matter of fact that the old Gaedhelic fosterage extended to the training and education not only of children up to the age of fourteen, but sometimes of youths up to that of seventeen years.

The daughters of peasants were taught by their fosterers to grind, to sift, and to knead, as well as the needle-work suited to their way of life; whilst the sons were taught the rearing of all sorts of young cattle, besides the kiln-drying of corn, and the preparation of malt, etc. Education of boys and girls in ancient Erinn.

The daughters of the better and higher classes were instructed in sewing, cutting, and embroidering cloth; whilst the sons were taught the game of chess, the art of swimming and riding, and the use of the Sword and Spear.

In fact, the Gaedhelic foster-parents in some sense filled the place among the ancients of what would now be called masters of boarding schools, and they did often actually keep large establishments for the accommodation of many pupils;—though sometimes also they were simply private tutors residing in the family or within the domain of the parents of their pupils. All this will be found in the Brehon Laws in full detail, when that great collection sees the light.

To return to our immediate subject.

The earliest, indeed I might say the only, reference to a regular Professor of the Military Art that I have met with, occurs as

LECT. XVII.

First historical allusion to a Military Teacher,

In the account of the Battle of Móin Trogaidhé.

Of Trogaidhé, a Military teacher before B.C. 1000

Of Cimbaeth, (A.M. 4480); the head of the Champions of the "Royal Branch".

far back as the reign of the monarch Siorna Saeghlach, a king who was killed at the battle of Aillinn [now Knockaulin in the county of Kildare.] A.M. 4169; that is, according to the chronology of the Annals of the Four Masters, about B.C. 1,000. One of the great battles recorded to have been fought and gained by this Siorna, was the battle of Móin Trogaidhé in the district afterwards called Ciannacht in East Meath, which took place under these circumstances. Siorna was a great warrior; and among other distinguished feats of arms, it was he that drove the ancient Rudricians from the sovereignty of Tara; and it was he that reduced Munster to obedience to the king of Tara. The king of Munster, however, (Lugair, the son of Lugaidh, a prince of of the Ebercean line), did not remain long obedient to him, but secretly invited the Fomorians to come in and join him in an effort to recover his independence. These marauders came in great force, headed by Ceadarn [or Ceasarn] their king; and having been joined by Lugair and his Munstermen, the battle of Móin Trogaidhé was fought between them and the monarch, in which the latter was victorious, but in which the two leaders were killed, as well as great numbers on both sides. (The ancient authorities state, however, that it was by a sudden plague which descended on them when the battle was at its height, that the two adverse leaders and the greater part of the slain fell.)

Who Trogaidhé was, from whom the bog, (móin), at which this battle was fought received its name, we do not know; but from the following two stanzas from a short ancient poem commemorative of the battle, which is preserved in the Book of Leinster, we gather that he was the great Teacher of the Military Art in Erin, in his time:

"The battle of Móin Trogaidhé in the east,
In which the Fomorians were cut down;
He who fought it, at the swelling hill,
Was Lugair the son of Lugaidh Lamh-fhind.

"He from whom Móin Trogaidhé is named,
Was Trogaidhé, the Tutor of the young Warriors of Erin,
And even of the Fomorians too,
Before the fight of this great battle". (348)

From Trogaidhé we come down to Cimbaeth, who was monarch of Erin A.M. 4484, and who appears to have been an accomplished warrior. He reigned as the husband of the only sovereign queen that ever owned legitimate sway over all

(348) orig.:—Cath Móna Trogaidé tair, i corpenatar fomoraig;
hé do pat con talaig éino, Lugair mac lugadé lair-fíno.

De adá Móin Trogaidé teno, Trogaidé, aithe éo nhepno, ocur fomoraé tall éra,
cen imbualao nayo cata.

Erinn, the famous Macha Mong-ruadh, who succeeded to the monarchy in right of her father, and maintained her exclusive right by force of arms against the three sons of Dithorba, and others, who claimed an alternate septennial right, and of whom Cimbaeth was one. Macha, however, when she succeeded to the throne, married Cimbaeth, and gave him the chief command of her army; and Cimbaeth appears to have been previously the head, if not the founder, of the champions of the Royal Branch of Emania.

This may be inferred from an ancient poem preserved in the Book of Leinster, of which the following is the first stanza:

"Cimbaeth, the Chief of the Young Warriors of Emania, Possession took of the lordly lands of Tara,—
The husband of Macha full of pride,
The director of the battalions of the Royal Branch".<sup>(349)</sup>

It is stated, on the authority, also, of the Book of Leinster, that this Cimbaeth was the tutor of the celebrated monarch and warrior, Ugainé Mór, who afterwards carried the fame of his arms so far as into Italy itself. Ugainé Mór was the direct ancestor of all the great Eremonian families of Ulster, Leinster, and Connacht.

From Cimbaeth and Ugainé Mór, we pass now to the century immediately preceding the Incarnation, at which time the Royal Branch and its champions appear to have attained their highest degree of celebrity.

A fair instance of the fosterage system of the Gaedhils at this time, is preserved in the Leabhar na h-Uidhré in the case of Eochaidh Beg the son of Cairbré, king of the ancient territory of Cliach, (a district situate about Cnoc Ainé, in the present county of Limerick). This Eochaidh had at one time forty foster-sons, or pupils, under his care, the sons of the chiefs and nobles of Munster; and when he had received an invitation from Ailill and Medbh, the king and Queen of Connacht, to visit them at Cruachan, he is said to have gone there attended by his forty pupils each mounted on a richly-caparisoned steed.

It was at this time, as I have said, that the champions of the Royal Branch had attained their highest degree of celebrity. Among these champions the most celebrated were: Conchobar Mac Nessa, king of Ulster; Cuchulainn Mac Soaltainn; Fergus Mac Roigh; Fergus Mac Leité; Celtchair Mac Uithir; Eogan Mac Durthacht; Dubhthach "Dael Uladh"; Conall Cear-

LECT. XVII.

Instance of the system of Fosterage
under Eochaidh Beg.The Champions of the "Royal Branch".

(349) original:—Cimbaeth, cleite nó nemna, no gab tiri toparé Tempa,
ceile maíca meit ualle,
cono cata na Cpaeb Ruaidé.

LECT. XVII. nach (Mac Amergin); three sons of Uisnech, namely, Naoisé, Annlé, and Ardán; and Laeghairé Buadhach Mac Connaid.

The "Gamannrians"; and the Clanna Deaghaidh. There were besides these champions of the Royal Branch, of Emania, two other great bands of champions in Erin at this time, namely, the "Gamannrians" of Connacht, a tribe of the Firbolg race, of whom Ferdiaidh Mac Damain was the chief at this time; and the Clanna Deaghaidh of Middle Munster, who were of Ulster origin, and the chief of whom was the celebrated champion Curoi Mac Dairé. Little, however, has come down to us of the particular history of the Gamannrians and Clanna Deaghaidh; whilst the champions of the Royal Branch have filled a large space in our bardic and romantic history.

Accounts of Cuchulainn in the tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgne. It does not appear, as far as we know, that there was any special college for Military Education at Emania; but there is evidence to show that the use of arms and military training formed no unimportant part of the general course of education which the noble youths of the province certainly received there. The chief references to this education are found in the somewhat romantic life of Cuchulainn, as preserved in the tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgne and other ancient tracts; and it is therefore through him that we must attempt to arrive at anything like distinct notions on the subject. In order to do this, therefore, we must have recourse again to the tale of the Táin Bo Chuailgne.

When the forces of Connacht in their first march had advanced as far as the neighbourhood of Slane in Meath, on their way into Ulster, we are told that they were often surprised to find their advanced guards and guides unaccountably cut off, their headless trunks being sometimes fastened to their horses, and these turned back to the main army, where they caused no little consternation. The king and queen of Connacht being at a great loss to know who they were that caused such destruction of their men, sent for Fergus Mac Róigh, the famous Ulster chieftain who had been for years in exile at their court under the displeasure of Conchobar the king of Ulster. Fergus having been questioned as to who he thought might have killed the advanced guards and scouts of the army, told them that he could not guess unless it was his own pupil, "the little boy Cuchulainn"; but the king and queen of Connacht laughed at the notion that a youth of Cuchulainn's age, (for he was then but in his seventeenth year), could have performed such deeds, or could be dreaded as capable of offering any serious obstruction to the march of so formidable an army as that which they commanded. To this Fergus had no answer to make, but that from what he had known of the mere boyhood of

Cuchulainn, they might expect extraordinary deeds from him LECT. XVII.
in his now more mature years; and he then gives the following sketch of the feats of the boy among his fellow-pupils and playmates at their sports and exercises at Emania. The passage is somewhat long, but it contains so much that is pertinent to the subject of our inquiry here, that I shall not hesitate to quote it in full.

"This boy, said Fergus, was nursed in the house of his father and mother in the plain of Muirtheimné, where he soon heard the history of the youths of Emania. This was the way in which the king Conchobar spent his time, ever since he has taken upon him the government of the province. He divides the day into three parts. The first third part he spends in superintending the noble youths of the province at the games of military exercise and ball hurling. The second third he spends in playing Brandabh, (that is Draughts, or some similar game), and Fidchell, (that is, Chess;) and the last third in eating, and drinking, until sleep seizes on the company, professors of music and amusements entertaining them at the same time. And though we are a long time in exile through him", said Fergus, "I pledge my word that there is not in all Erin nor in Alba a man like unto Conchobar".

Early education of
Cuchulainn.
(His boyish feats.)

"And, as we have said, the boy Cuchulainn had heard the story of the youths and princes of Emania; for there were at all times an hundred and fifty youths at exercise there; and he said to his mother, who was sister to king Conchobar, that he wished also to go and practise his exercises in the play-ground of Emania. 'It is too early for you to do this, my little son', said his mother; 'not until some one of the champions of Ulster conducts you thither, or some one of Conchobar's companions shall be security for your protection and safety from the youths'. 'I think that too long, mother,' said the little boy; 'and I shall not wait; but tell me where Emania lies'. 'The place in which it lies is far from you,' said his mother; 'and the mountain Sliabh Fuaid is between you and Emania'. 'I will guess at where it is', said he".

"The boy set out then, taking with him his 'instruments of pleasure'. He took his 'Shield of Laths'; and his 'Red-Bronze Hurl'; and his 'Silver Ball'; and his 'throwing Dart'; and his (mock) 'Wooden Spear', with the burned top; and he shortened the way by means of them. He would give his ball a stroke of his hurl, and drive it to a great distance before him; he would throw his hurl at it, and give it a second stroke that would drive it no shorter distance than the first. He would cast his dart and hurl his wooden spear, and run himself after

LECT. XVII.

Early education of (Cuchulainn.
(His boyish feats.)

them. He would take up his hurl, and his ball, and his dart; and the end of his wooden spear would not have touched the ground before he had caught it by the top while still flying. In this manner he went on until he reached the platform, [that is, the lawn ranged with seats,] of Emania, where the young princes were at their sports.—

“The boy ran at once into the play-ground among them, and he snatched up the ball between his legs from them, and he did not let it pass his knees up nor his ankles down; and he kept it and closed it between his two legs, and not one of them could reach it with a prod, a blow, a stroke, or a thrust; and in that manner he carried it over the brink of the goal from them. They all looked at him together; and he was a surprise and a wonder to them. ‘Good, O youths’, said Fallamain the son of king Conchobar, ‘attack yonder boy all of you, and let him get his death at our hands; for it is an insult to you that any youth should presume to come among you without having first claimed your protection; and now attack him all of you together, though we know that he is the son of one of the champions of Ulster, for he has omitted, in coming into our play-ground, to put himself under our protection’. They all attacked him then. They threw their three times fifty hurlies at his head; but he raised his single pleasure-hurl, and warded off the three times fifty hurlies. They then flung their three times fifty balls at the boy; but he raised his fists, his wrists, and his palms, and he warded off the three times fifty balls. They then threw at him their three times fifty mock spears of wood burned at the end; but the boy raised his little lath-shield, and he warded off the three times fifty wooden spears. Then did he rush furiously upon them, and dashed fifty of them against the ground; five of them”, continued Fergus, “rushed between me and Conchobar, over the chess-board at which we were playing on the ground, and made towards the palace; and the little boy followed them closely; but in springing over our table the king caught him by both wrists and addressed him thus.—

“‘Holla, my little boy’, (said the king), ‘I perceive that you are dealing harshly with the youths’. ‘I have great cause for that’, said the little boy; ‘I have not received from the youths the honour due to a stranger, though I have come from afar’. ‘How is this, and who are you?’ said Conchobar. ‘I am little Setanta, the son of Soaltann and of Decteré, your own sister; and it is not at your hands I should expect to be thus aggrieved’, said the little boy. ‘What, my little son’, said Conchobar, ‘are you not aware of the privilege of the youths, that it is an insult to them that a stranger youth should enter among them until he had first put himself under their protection.' 'I was not aware of that', said the little boy; 'had I known it, I should have been more cautious'. 'Good, now, O youths', said Conchobar, 'take upon yourselves the protection of this little boy, forthwith'. 'We are content to do so indeed', said they. So the boy put himself under the protection of the youths, and Conchobar released his hands.—

LECT. XVII.

Early education of Cuchulainn. (His boyish feats.)

"No sooner was this done however, than the little boy rushed on them again, and dashed fifty young princes of them in succession to the ground under him, with such force that their fathers thought that they were dead; it was not so, however, but they were stunned with surprise and terror. 'Holla', said Conchobar, 'what do you mean towards them further?' 'I have sworn by my gods whom I adore', said the little boy, 'that until they have all come under my protection and under my defence, in the same way that I have gone under theirs, I shall not take my hands off them until I have laid them all prostrate on the ground'. 'Good, my little boy', said Conchobar, 'take thou on thee the protection of the princes'. 'I do so', said the little boy. The young princes then put themselves under his protection and defence".

"A little boy who performed these deeds at the age of five years", said Fergus, "who prostrated the sons of the warriors and champions of Ulster, at the door of their own palace, it is no wonder that he should perform the deeds which appear so surprising to you, now, when he is in the seventeenth year of his age".

After Fergus had finished this relation of the first display of the strength and dexterity of Cuchulainn, (who was, it is to be remembered, at the next stage of his career, the pupil in arms of Fergus himself), another of the Ulster exiles takes up the second part of the wonderful "little boy's" history, and relates it also to the king and queen of Connacht. This portion also of the tale I must give at the same length, because it embraces a great variety of allusions to the gymnastic practices which formed an essential part of the training of a young champion, in the days of king Conchobar and the "Royal Branch". It is also interesting as describing the feat which gained for the young Setanta the since so famous name of "Cuchulainn". The narrator in the present instance was Cormac Conloingeas, one of king Conchobar's own sons:

"'The same little boy', said he, 'performed another great deed in the year that followed'. 'What deed was that?' said Ailill [king of Connacht]. 'It was this', said Cormac. 'There was in

LECT. XVII.

Early education of Cuchulainn. (His boyish feats.)

Ulster a certain artificer in metals [a cerd, i.e. an armourer], whose name was Culand. This Culand on one occasion prepared a feast for king Conchobar, and went to Emania to invite him to it; and he asked the king to come to his house with a small company, because it was not a territory or land that he had for his support, but "the profits of hammers, his anvil, his hands, and his tongs": and Conchobar said that he would go with only a small company. So Culand returned to his house to prepare meat and drink for the king's party".

"Conchobar remained at Emania until his assembly broke up at the approach of the close of the day. The king then put on his light travelling suit, and went out to the play-ground to take his leave of the young princes, where he saw what surprised him very much; namely, three times fifty boys at the one end of the green, and only one boy at the other end; and the one boy gaining every game and goal at the hurling from the three times fifty boys. When it was the game of the hole they played, and when it was their turn to throw and his to defend, he would catch their three times fifty balls outside the hole, and would not let one of them pass him into it. When it was their turn to defend, and his to throw, he would send the three times fifty balls into the hole without missing one, in spite of them. When it was the feat of pulling off each other's clothes, he would snatch away their three times fifty cloaks off them; and they would not be able to remove so much as his brooch from his cloak. When the time for wrestling came, he would bring down the three times fifty boys to the ground; but from among them all there could not be found a sufficient number to lay hold of him. Then king Conchobar said on seeing the boys: Ah youths, said he, happy is the land from which has come the boy whom you see,—if he had only been as well instructed in the feats of championhood as he is in those of boyhood". "It is not proper to speak so", said Fergus, "for, according to the manner in which the little boy has performed his actions, [it is clear] he must [already] know the feats of championhood".

Cormac Conloingeas goes on to tell how, after this conversation king Conchobar asked the boy to accompany him to the feast to which he was then going; but the boy refused to go until he and his comrades had finished their sports and exercises; but promising that when these were over for the day, he would then follow the royal party. When evening came, each of the youths retired to the house of his father and mother, or to that of his nurse and tutor; and their meeting broke up. The boy, Setanta, then set out in the track of the royal cortege, and found little difficulty in making his way to the smith's house. When arrived there, however, he found his approach to the door prevented by a huge, ferocious watch-dog, whose inhospitable growl at seeing him rang through the Armourer's establishment, as well as throughout all the neighbourhood. On hearing this, the Armourer asked king Conchobar if he had appointed with any one to follow him. The king said he had not; but immediately recollecting the boy's promise to do so, he shouted to his friends to go out and save him, as he was certain that the dog had torn him to pieces. When they went out, however, they found the great dog lying dead on the platform, and the boy standing over him in triumph. Fergus at once snatched him up on his shoulder and carried him into Conchobar's presence, who received him with joy. The Armourer too bade him welcome, but said that the honour of his company was too dearly purchased by the loss of his noble dog, which not only guarded his own house and flocks, but those also of the whole district around him. Make yourself easy on that head, my friend, said the boy, for if there be a pup of the breed of your dog in all Erin, I will procure him for you; and I shall myself take on me the duties of your former dog, until the young one comes to the age of efficiency. Upon which Cathbad, the celebrated Druid, who always attended the king on his excursions, proposed to the "little boy" to relinquish his name of Setanta, and called upon him to adopt in future that of Cu-Chulainn, "the Hound of Culand", the Armourer; and he declared that under that name his fame would live for ever in the mouths of the men of Erin and Alba. And so it was that he obtained that name which, in verification of the Druid's prophecy, has been preserved with honour and distinction in the records of the men of Erin and Alba even to this day.

Cormac Conloingeas having finished his part of the relation before the king and queen of Connacht, the theme of Cuchulainn's exploits was taken up in continuation by Fiach Mac Fir-Abu, another of the Ultonian exiles at the Connacht court, as follows:

"The boy performed a third series of exploits in the year which followed," said Fiacha Mac Fir-Abu. 'What deed did he perform?' said king Ailill. 'Cathbad the Druid was lecturing his pupils on the north-east side of Emania, where he had a hundred youths industriously learning Druidism from him; that was the number that Cathbad always instructed. One of his students asked him what that day would be propitious for? Cathbad answered: The young warrior who shall receive the arms of championhood on this day, the fame of his name and

LECT. XVII.
Early education of Cuchulainn. (His boyish feats.)

LECT. XVII.

Early education of
Cuchulainn.
(His boyish feats.)

deeds shall live in Erin "go brath", [i.e. for ever]. Now Cuchulainn (who was on the south side of the palace) overheard this; and he immediately repaired to king Conchobar, to where he was taking repose in his sleeping house. 'All good attend thee, O king of Champions', said the boy. 'That is the salutation of a person who is about to ask something', said Conchobar. 'And what is it you want, my little son?' said he. 'To take arms', said the boy. 'Who instructed you in this, my boy?' said Conchobar. 'Cathbad the druid', said the boy. 'I shall not disappoint you then', said Conchobar.—

"Conchobar then presented him with two Spears, a Sword, and a Shield. The boy poised and balanced the arms until he shivered them to atoms. Conchobar gave him two other Spears, and a Shield and Sword; and he poised and balanced and shook them also, until they were shivered to pieces like the others. In fine, the fifteen suits of arms which king Conchobar had always in reserve for the youths,—for whichever of them embraced knighthood, it was Conchobar that presented him with the accoutrements of battle, in virtue of which the candidate received 'the gift of superior valour',—those fifteen suits of arms, I say, in succession, the boy shivered to pieces. 'These are not good arms my master, Conchobar', said the boy; 'they are not worthy of my acceptance'. Then Conchobar presented him with his own two Spears, his Sword, and his Shield. He poised and balanced and shook them, and he bent them until their points touched their heads, and none of them were broken, but they withstood his test. 'These are good arms indeed', said the boy, 'they suit me exactly'; and he thanked the king for the arms, and said: 'Happy the people and the race of whom he whose arms these are is king'. 'Good, my boy', said Conchobar, 'go into your chariot now, for that is the first thing you are to do'.

"He went then into a chariot; and the first chariot he went into he jolted and shook until he shivered it to pieces; and each of the fifteen chariots which Conchobar always had ready for the acceptance of the youths at Emania, was shattered to pieces by him in the same way. 'These are not good chariots, my master, Conchobar', said the boy; 'there is not one of them sufficient for my purpose'. 'Where is Ibar the son of Riaghabra?' said Conchobar. 'Here, indeed', said Ibar. 'Take my own two steeds for this boy, and yoke them to my chariot', said Conchobar. So the Charioteer brought the horses and yoked them to the Chariot; and the boy went into it, and jolted and shook it with all his strength, but it withstood all his efforts to break it. 'This', said he, 'is a good Chariot, and exactly suits me'. 'Very well then, boy', said the charioteer,

'let the horses go to their grazing now'. 'It is too soon, yet,' Ibar, said the boy; 'drive around Emania this day, as this is my first day of taking arms, that it may be the "gift of valour" to me'. So they drove three times round Emania.—

LECT. XVII.
Early education of
Cuchulainn.
(His boyish feats.)

"Let the horses go to their grazing, now", said Ibar. 'It is too soon yet', said the boy: 'go forward until the young princes salute me on this my first day of taking arms'. They went forward accordingly to where the young princes were. 'Is it arms he has taken?' said each to the other. 'It is, indeed', said he himself. 'May you have victory, and trophy, and "first wounding" with them', said they; 'but we think it is too soon you have taken them, because it will separate you from us at our exercises', said they. 'I shall not separate from you at all', said he; 'but it was for luck I took arms on this day'.—

"Cuchulainn then asked his Charioteer where the great road which passed by Emania led to; and he answered that it led to Ath na Forairé, (i.e. the Ford of Watching), at Sliabh Fuaid; (a well-known mountain lying at the south of ancient Emania, in the present county of Armagh). 'Why is this ford called the Ford of Watching?' said Cuchulainn. 'Because', said Ibar, 'there is an Ultonian champion constantly watching and guarding there, in order that no warriors nor foreigners should come unperceived into Ulster, without being challenged by him to battle; and that champion must answer any such challenge on the part of the whole province; and if any "professional parties" (i.e. poets, etc.), were to leave the province in displeasure at the manner in which they had been rewarded there, it would be his duty to conciliate them, by the bestowal on them of such gifts and presents as may be sufficient to preserve the honour of the province; and also if any professional parties passed into the province, it is this champion that acts as their safeguard until they reach the presence of king Conchobar; so that their poems and their songs should be the first sung at Emania, after their arrival there'. "Do you know who is at that ford to-day?" said Cuchulainn. 'I do, indeed; it is the valiant and victorious Conall Cearnach, the Royal Champion of Erin', said Ibar. 'Well, then', said Cuchulainn, 'you drive on until we reach that ford'.—

"They drove on accordingly till they came to the brink of the ford, where Conall was. 'Is it arms he has taken?' said Conall. 'It is, indeed', said Ibar. 'May they be arms of victory, and triumph, and first-wounding to you', said Conall; 'but we think it is too soon that you have taken them, because you are not arrived at the age of valour yet'. 'What do you do here, my master, Conall?' said Cuchulainn. 'I keep watch

LECT. XVII. and guard for the province here, my little son', said Conall.
 Early educa- 'Go you then to Emania for the present, my master Conall, tion of said the boy, 'and leave me here to keep watch and ward for Cuchulainn. (His boyish feats.) the province'. 'Not so, my little son', said Conall, 'you are not yet strong enough to fight with a brave champion'. 'I will go on to the south then, to the Ford of Loch Echtrann, to try if I can dip my hands in the blood of a foe to-day', said Cuchulainn. 'Then I will go to protect you, that you go not alone to the border of the province', said Conall. 'You shall not', said Cuchulainn. 'But I shall', said Conall; 'else the Ultonians would censure me for allowing you to go alone to the border of the province'.—

"Then Conall's horses were yoked to his chariot; and he went forth to protect the boy. But when Conall came up abreast with him, knowing well that if any opportunity of performing a creditable action should occur, Conall would give him no share, Cuchulainn stooped, and picked from the ground a stone the full of his hand, and threw it with all his force at the yoke (cuing) of Conall's chariot, so that he broke it in two; and the chariot fell down, and Conall was hurled out of it with such force as to dislocate his shoulder. 'Who has done this, my son?' said Conall. 'It was I that threw it, to know if my throw was straight, or how I could shoot, or whether I am "the makings" of a brave champion at all', said Cuchulainn. 'There is venom on your throw, and venom on yourself', said Conall, enraged; 'and if I were sure that you would leave your head with your enemies on this occasion, I would not move a step to save you!' 'That is what I have sought from you', said the boy, 'because I know that you Ultonians are bound under obligations not to proceed in a chariot with insecure trappings'".

After this adventure Conall Cearnach makes the best of his way northwards [back to Emania] to repair his chariot, and to obtain aid for himself; while Cuchulainn presses on to the south, and does not halt until he has crossed the bounds of the province of Ulster, into Meath, at the place in which the little river Mattock falls into the Boyne, about three miles above Drogheda. Here the boy champion draws up at the gate of the formidable Dun, or court, of the lady of Nechtan Scéné, where he sounded a challenge, and was soon answered by her three sons in succession. Each of them, however, meets his death in fair combat at the hands of the hero; and after this he returns in triumph to Emania, where he exhibits the heads of three of the most formidable enemies of his native province, as the fruits of the first day of his championhood.

Such, then, was Cuchulainn's early military training. From other passages in the Táin Bo Chuailgné, as well as from equally ancient and independent tracts, we know that Fergus Mac Róigh himself had been the special military tutor of the hero. This is clearly asserted in an ancient tale called the Seirgligi Coinchulainn, the "Sick Bed of Cuchulainn"), preserved in the Leabhar-na-h-Uidhré.<sup>(350)</sup> In this tract Cuchulainn speaks distinctly of Fergus as his tutor, and of Conall Cearnach as therefore his "fellow-pupil"; though the latter must have been so much older than himself, his education having been probably completed before Cuchulainn was born.

LECT. XVII.

From these references to what is recorded of Cuchulainn's early life, we may fairly collect what constituted the military education of a champion of the "Royal Branch", or, I suppose, of any other order, in the storied days of Erin's military glory, that period which is spoken of in ancient Irish manuscripts as the Aimsir na cCuradh, that is, "The Time of the Champions". It appears clearly enough that the sons of the chiefs and nobles received from their infancy an elaborate training in athletic exercises, as well as in the use of the spear and shield; but it does not appear from any original authority that I know of, that there was any such institution as a special military School, with regular Professors and a regular system, as in the Schools of Literature and Law. The allusion in the Táin Bo Chuailgné to the retirement of the youths at Emania from their play ground at the close of day, each to the house of his parents, or to that of his nurse, and his tutor, indicates pretty clearly indeed that the tuition of the future candidates for admission to the order of Champions was individual; and there can be indeed but little doubt that each distinguished Champion in his time was the effective teacher of his profession to one or more pupils, either as a matter of friendship or emolument. In this way Cuchulainn himself, in his time, was military tutor of Lugaidh Riabh-Derg, ("the Son of the Three Fair Twins", as he was called), who was subsequently Monarch of Erin, and probably of others of less note of whom no particular record has come down to us.

Early training of young warriors at this time.

Passing on then from this point for the present, we have still to draw from the history of Cuchulainn, as it is preserved in the various ancient tracts devoted to the life of that hero, something more interesting still in the account of that part of his education for which he is said to have travelled into Alba, or Scotland, a course which seems to have been frequently

Later education in arms of Cuchulainn, (in Alba—Scotland.)

<sup>(350)</sup> [This very ancient Tale has been published in full, with Translation and Notes, by Professor O'Curry, in the ATLANTIS, (Dublin, 1858, 1859),—vol. i. p. 362, and vol. ii. p. 95.]

LECT. XVII.

Later education in arms of Cuchulainn, (in Alba,—Scotland.) taken by young warriors of peculiar promise. The occasion on which he was induced to take this means of perfecting his accomplishments as a champion, is stated as follows.—

It seems that at length when he arrived at man's estate, feeling that his exploits and fame as a knight had fully kept pace with his years, Cuchulainn bethought him of taking a wife suitable to his rank; and after no inconsiderable search for a lady to his taste, he at last found her in Emer, the second daughter of Forgall Monach, a "chief Brughaidh", or "noble farmer", who held extensive lands along the north-eastern coast of the present county of Dublin, and who kept one of the "six great Courts of Hospitality in Erin", at Lusca [the place now called Lusk]. His visit to Lusca was for the moment fruitless, since Emer could not be persuaded to accept his hand without the consent of her father; and that personage, it would appear, had no high regard for the position of a professional Champion. Cuchulainn accordingly returned to Emania, without formally demanding the alliance, but without abandoning his intention to take another opportunity of prevailing with the lady. It was not long before Forgall Monach, the father of Emer, received information of the suspicious visit of the great Champion of Ulster to his daughter; and not doubting but that a good understanding had been established between them, he resolved to take immediate measures to put a stop to any chance of a renewal of their intercourse. With this view, then, he "changed his countenance and his dress to the countenance and dress of a foreigner", (so we are informed); and having done the same for two of his most trusted adherents, the three repaired to Emania, where they represented themselves as ambassadors "from the king of the Galls" [i.e. foreigners], who had come with presents from their royal master to king Conchobar. The story tells us that they were hospitably received; and that there was a review of the knights of the Royal Branch held before them, at which all the feats and evolutions of the most approved military education of the country were performed. This was the opportunity sought by Forgall Monach. Speaking in the guise of a foreign ambassador, he was lavish of his praises of the noble performance of the knights, and particularly of Cuchulainn, whom he pronounced to excel in all branches of the art which could be acquired at home; but he strongly recommended him to pass into Scotland and place himself for some time under the tuition of the Champion Domhnall; after which he should, he said, cross that country as far as the great Military College of the celebrated lady Scathach, upon which he enlarged; and he concluded by saying that, after perfecting his studies with these famous teachers, he would certainly be the most accomplished champion in Europe. Cuchulainn listened, we are told, with natural satisfaction to these disinterested recommendations, and he immediately began his preparations for a journey into Scotland; though it appears that before his departure he contrived to secure a private interview with the beautiful Emer, in which they are said to have exchanged the vows of constancy usual on such occasions.

L.F.C.T. XVII
Later education in arms of Cuchulainn, (in Ailbe, in Scotland.)

Cuchulainn, however, did pass into Scotland; and we learn that in due time he proceeded at once to the residence of the champion Domhnall, (though where exactly that was, I am unable to say); and he seems to have spent some time in taking lessons from him; but he soon set out again to the more distinguished establishment of the lady Scathach. The description of the young hero's journey thither partakes largely of the wild and wonderful; but all dangers and difficulties having been at last escaped and every obstruction overcome he succeeded in arriving safely at the court in which the pupils of Scathach resided. The ancient tale then goes on.

"He asked them then where Scathach was. 'In yonder island,' said they. 'By what path do people reach it?' said he. 'Over the Bridge of the Pupils,' said they; 'but no one can pass that until he is perfect in his championship,' said they. (For this, "continues this very wild tale," was the way in which that bridge was fashioned: it had two low heads, or ends, and it was high in the middle; and when a person stood on one end of it, the other end would rise up and he would be cast off to the bottom".) It is stated in other copies, that there was a party of Champions from Erin at this court when Cuchulainn came there, learning additional feats of arms from Scathach; among whom were Ferdiaidh Mac Damain from Connacht, [he who was slain by Cuchulainn afterwards in the Táin Bo Chuailgne]; also Naosé Mac Uisnech from Ulster, [the unfortunate husband of the beautiful Deirdré and the hero of the celebrated tale];<sup>(251)</sup> Loch Mor Mac Morfebis from Munster; Fiamain Mac Forai from Ulster; and a great number beside. Cuchulainn made three efforts to pass the bridge, but he did not succeed; and the pupils began to reproach him. "Then", continues the story, "he became vexed, and he leaped on the end of the bridge, and springing a champion's salmon-sault, he alighted on its centre, not giving the bridge time to raise its other head before he reached it, and with another spring from that he alighted on the ground in the island. There he saw the court before him, and made directly for it; and in his anger he broke the gate that stood in the way, and passed through it. This was told to the lady Scathach. 'True', said she, 'this is a man that has finished his Championship in some other place',—and she sent her daughter Uathach to know who the youth was. So Uathach went out to meet him; but when she came to see him distinctly, (says the old tale, with great simplicity) she could not utter a word, so much did the beauty and symmetry of the man astonish her. And she returned to her mother; and having recovered her speech on the way, she described in terms of the highest praise the appearance of the man she had seen. 'You have fallen in love with this man', said her mother;—'It is so indeed'; said Uathach".

<sup>(251)</sup> [The first of the "Three Most Sorrowful Tales" of Erin is that of the "Exile of the Children of Uisnech" and the death of Deirdré. The oldest version of this celebrated Tale was published (with Translation and Notes) by Professor O'Curry, in the ATLANTIS (Dublin, 1862), vol. iii. p. 377;—the two other tales in ATLANTIS, vol. iv. p. 113.]

LECT. XVII.

Later education in arms of Cuchulainn (in Alba—Scotland.)

We are then told how Cuchulainn was kindly received by the mother, and joyfully by the daughter; whose attentions to him were however for some time thrown away, as he had not yet thought of breaking his pledge to Emer. But after he had rested three days, the ancient narrator records that he had a conversation with the young amazon, Uathach; when she said, that if it was to perfect his Championship he had come, he would do well to go to her mother Scathach where she was giving private lessons to her two sons, Cuar and Ceat; that having reached the spot "he should spring a 'Champion's salmon-sault' up into the great thick yew-tree, in which she was lying; and that he should then place the point of his sword between her breasts until she had promised him his three requests, which should be: to teach him all, without reservation; to marry herself (Uathach) to him; and to tell him his future destiny, for she was a prophetess". And Cuchulainn, who appears to have readily agreed to every portion of these suggestions, accordingly at once repaired to where Scathach was, "placed his two feet on the edges of the exercise basket, [whatever that was], sprang into the tree, and bared his sword and placed its point to her heart: 'A terrible death', said he. 'You shall have any three requests such as they come with your breath without consideration', said she". So he accepts her terms and binds her to performance; and Scathach fairly performs her promises; for, she gives him her daughter to wife; teaches him all her secrets in the military art; and when at last Cuchulainn leaves her to return home, she tells him all the events of his future life.<sup>(152)</sup>

<sup>(152)</sup> The Tale above quoted proceeds to narrate another passage of Cuchulainn's life in Alba, or Scotland, which, though too diffuse to be introduced into the text, may be abridged here by way of note. It offers some strange allu-

The tract then proceeds to enumerate an interesting list of the names of the various feats (cleasa) of championship which it is recorded that Cuchulainn learned perfectly from Scathach: LECT. XVII.
List of the various
"Feats of Championship" learned by Cuchulainn in the School of Scathach.

During Cuchulainn's sojourn with Scathach, a quarrel sprang up between her and a neighbouring nation which was governed by another famous amazon like herself whose name was Aife. Both the ladies assembled their forces respectively to decide their differences by battle. Cuchulainn accompanied the two sons of Scathach,—Cuar and Ceat,—to the battle, to meet the three bravest champions of the lady Aife, whose names were also Cuar and Ceat, and Craifne, the three sons of Ilsuanach. But when Cuchulainn came face to face with these three champions, he fought and slew them single-handed, without waiting for the general battle which was to take place on the next day.

The next day came, and the forces of both sides stood face to face; and the lady Aife put forward three other brave knights, Cire, and Biré, and Balene, the three sons of Eisse Enchinn. These three knights challenged Scathach's two sons to combat;—and here occurs one of the strangest scenes of combat which imaginative romance has ever suggested. The challenge was accepted; and the three challengers "sprang on the Ted Chlis", (which, it seems, was something like a tight-rope for dancers), on which these strange knights performed their feats of arms and their combats. Cuchulainn, however, who was to have gone with Scathach's sons, sprang alone upon the rope and attacked the three knights, whom he slew in succession. Then the lady Aife, on seeing the death of her best champions, challenged the lady Scathach herself to single combat; but Cuchulainn took up the challenge. Before proceeding to engage the sorceress, however, Cuchulainn asked Scathach what she thought was most prized by her great opponent Aife; and Scathach answered, that it was her chariot and her two steeds. Then they sprang upon the rope, Cuchulainn and Aife, and they fought a fierce combat upon it, in which the sorceress shivered her spear and her sword. "Holla!" said Cuchulainn, "Aife's charioteer and her two chariot horses have fallen into the glen and are killed!" So Aife looked about her; whereupon Cuchulainn snatched her up suddenly on his shoulder, and descending to the ground with her, laid her prostrate at his feet, and placed the point of his sword at her breast. And Aife shouted out: "Life for life, O Cuchulainn!" said she. "Let me have my three requests", said he. "You shall have them, such as you ask in one breath", said she. "My three requests, then, are", said he, "that you submit to Scathach; that you revolt not against her; and that you take myself into your cherished friendship". "All is granted", said she;—and so the strange combat ended.

Cuchulainn having thus established peace between the warlike ladies, proceeded to return in triumph to his new conquest; but having to pass over the same rope again, he now found it occupied by "a fierce half-blind hag". She requested of him to make room for her and allow her to pass. He answered that he had not any other path on which to move except down the great cliff which was under him. She begged of him, however, to clear the way for her; and he accordingly dropped himself down from the rope, "holding by it with his forefinger and thumb only". The hag passed over him then, and endeavoured with her foot to remove his thumb from the rope, that he might drop down the cliff. But he perceived her motion and intention; and he "gave a champion's salmon-sault" up again, and with his sword cut off the hag's head. Now this hag was, it appears, the mother of the three sons of Eisse Enchinn whom he had already slain on the rope; and she had met him designedly on the rope, "knowing that under his vows of Championship he would make way for her on it"; and in the hope that by such means she would cause his death in revenge for that of her sons.

Cuchulainn then returned with Scathach and her forces to her own country, where in accordance with her promise she instructed him in the full perfection of the science of arms, as far as it was known to her.

LECT. XVII.

List of the various "Feats of Championship" learned by Cuchulainn in the School of Scathach.

"Ubhall-chleas, (the ball feat); Faebhar-chleas, (the small, sharp-edged shield feat); Torand-chleas, (the "thunder feat"), which was performed with the chariot around the enemy; Faen-chleas, (the "prostrate feat", one which I cannot explain from the name, unless it means that from lying flat on the ground, perhaps in ambush, the champion sprang suddenly to his feet;) Cleas-cletenech, (dart-feat); and the Ted-chleas, (rope-feat; which probably was that feat of the rope in which Cuchulainn overthrew the lady Aifé, and killed her three champions and the old hag their mother, [see note below, <sup>(252)</sup>]; or it was another feat which is mentioned in the Brehon Laws as one of three perfections of the education of a knight, and which will be presently described;) the Cleas-Cait, ("cat feat"; of which I know nothing); the Coriech n-Errid, (champion's salmon-sault, or -leap); the Imarchor n-delend, (the proper carrying of the charioteer's switch); the Leim-dar-n-eimh, (the leap over a fence (?); the Filliud erred nair, (the "whirl of a valiant champion"); the Gae-bolga, (the feat of casting the belly-dart, already described); the Bai-braissé, (literally, "sudden death" (?); the Roth-chleas, ("wheel feat"; a gymnastic performance resembling the casting of the sledge<sup>(253)</sup> at the present day); the Othar-chleas ("invalidating feat",—as well as I can understand the term); the Cleas for analaibh, (literally, the "feat of his breathings"); the Bruid-giné, ("gnashing of the mouth", as well as I can understand it); the Sian-Cauradh, (the champion's war-whoop); the Béim co famus, (cutting of his opponent's hair off with his sword); the Taith-béim, ("vertical stroke", which fixed his antagonist to the ground); the Fodh-béim, ("sod-blow", by which he cut the sod from under the feet of his antagonist, by a stroke of his sword; this was done in contempt); the Dreim fri foghuist, (climbing against a rock, so as to stand straight at its top); the Fonaidhm niadh for rinnibh Slegh, "coiling of a champion around the blades of upright Spears"); and the Carbad-Searrdha, (the feat of the armed, or scythed, chariot, in battle).

The tale from which these latter notes of Cuchulainn's achievements are taken, is the ancient tale known as that of the "Courtship of Emer, and the Education of Cuchulainn", (Tochmarc n-Eimire, ocas Foglaim Coinchulaind).<sup>(254)</sup> At the beginning of this Tale it is stated, that the feats (cleasa) of Championship which distinguished the knights of Emania at home, were limited to three, namely, the Cleas-Cletenech, or feat with darts; the Ubhall-Chleas, or feat with balls; and the Faebhar-Chleas, or feat with edged weapons, (such as knives, swords, or sharp-edged Shields). And we have it on the same authority, that all these feats were practised by the champions Conall Cearnach, Fergus Mac Róigh, Laeghairé Buadhach, Celtchair Mac Uithir, Dubhthach Dael-tenga, and Cuchulainn Mac Soaltainn, as well as the rest of the knights. Yet although these special feats are set down as part of the necessary education of a finished knight or champion, it can, I think, be clearly shewn that some of them at least were merely ornamental accomplishments by way of evidence of skill and dexterity, and not at all regarded as feats of arms intended for use in actual combat.

<sup>(253)</sup> [So described, apparently, in the ancient Tale of the Fledh Bricrind, ("Bricrind's Feast"); concerning which see Lectures on the M.S. Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 346, etc.]

<sup>(254)</sup> See Lectures on the M.S. Materials, (etc); p. 278.

LECT. XVII.
List of the various
"Feats of Championship" learned by Cuchulainn in the School of Scathach.

LECTURE XVIII.

[Delivered 4th July, 1858.]

(VI.) MILITARY EDUCATION; continued. Instances of distinguished champions acting as the military tutors of young champions. The system of fosterage, which continued, more or less, down to A.D. 1600, represented the ancient custom of military education. No reliable authority for a central military organization until the time of Conn "of the Hundred Battles"; probability however of the existence of such an organization. Origin of the name Fianna. Mention made in the "Book of Navan" of the organization of a military force by Cormac Muc Airt. Mention made of a large barrack at Tara in poems of Cinaeth O'Hartagan and Cuan O'Lothchain. Dr. Keting's account of the Fianna Eireann. List of Feinnian officers given in the Yellow Book of Lecain. Account of the battle of Cnambros in which the Fianna under Finn Mac Cumhaill were engaged. Destruction of the Fianna at the battle of Gabhra, A.D., 284. Instances of the employment of a regular army in Erin after the time of the battle of Gabhra.

It has been already observed that from all that can be discovered in the existing relics of our old historical literature, we must come to the conclusion that the Gaedhil had not among them any institutions which could strictly be called Military Colleges, as the term is understood in modern times. That there were numerous schools for literary and military instruction together, conducted by individual professors, there can, I think, be no doubt whatever; but we have no satisfactory information as regards the number of pupils or how these schools were efficiently worked at any one time.

Military tutors of celebrated Champions.

We find it recorded that the celebrated monarch of Erin, Ugaine Mór, who flourished about three hundred years before the Christian era, was educated by the famous champion Cimbaeth, king of Emania. So Cuchulainn, and Conall Cearnach, the famous knights of Emania, were educated by Fergus Mac Róigh of the same place; Lugaidh Riabhderg (afterwards monarch of Erin) by Cuchulainn; Conall Claringnech, a famous prince and Champion of Ulster, by Fíntann Mac Rudhraidhe, about the same period, that is, about the commencement of our era; Conn "of the Hundred Battles", monarch of Erin, by Conall Cruachua, king of Connacht, (who was of the Fírbolg race), about the middle of the second century; Laignech Ceannmór, son of the champion Conall Cearnach, (the ancestor of the O'Morad's or O'Mores of Laighis, or Leix, in Leinster), by Eochaidh Finn, brother to the monarch Conn, also in the second century;

Eoghan Mór, king of Munster, the great opponent of the monarch Conn, by Nuadha Dearg, a celebrated Munster chieftain; Cormac, the son of Art, son of Conn,—who was monarch of Erin in the third century,—by Lughna Firtri, a chieftain of Connacht; Fiacha Muillethan, the son of Eoghan Mór, son of Oilioll Olum, by his maternal grandfather, Dill the Druid, and under the superior direction of the celebrated Druid Mogh Ruith; Connla, the son of Fadg, son of Cran, son of Oilioll Olum, king of Munster, by the monarch Cormac, the son of Art; Conall Echluath, (the ancestor of the great Dalcassian families of Thomond,) by Crimhthann Mór, monarch of Erin in the fourth century. So Niall “of the Nine Hostages”, monarch of Erin, and Corc Mac Luighech, king of Munster, were educated together by the poet Torna Eigeas, (of the district of O’Torna in Kerry), also in the fourth century. And lastly Conall Gulban, the son of Niall “of the Nine Hostages”, was educated at Beinn Gulban, in Connacht, by a sub-tutor named Muiredhach Meann, under a superior tutor named Fiachra.

These few instances are sufficient to show what the general system of the country was in regard to the education in arms; the principal champions, whether kings or inferior chieftains, presiding over the military education of the more promising youths and young champions of each period. However, there can be but little doubt that at Tara, as well as at each of the provincial courts, there were (as by law it was certainly prescribed there should be) more regular establishments of a public kind, and upon a more extended system; though it is true that no particular detailed account of these schools has escaped the wreck of ages, as far as I am informed on the subject, excepting what has been quoted from the Brehon Laws, namely, that the sons of the kings and chiefs, under the Law of Fosterage and Tutorage, were taught riding, swimming, chess, draughts, or backgammon, with the use of the sword, spear, and all other weapons offensive and defensive. And as these fosterage laws, preserved—though irregularly—by the natives, and adopted by the Anglo-Normans continued in full force in one form or another down even to about the year 1600, the custom may be very fairly accepted as a living representation of an ancient universal system. It is in consequence of this ancient and universal custom of military education by way of Fosterage, that we find in genealogies and histories such names as Domhnall Connachtach O’Brien, so called because he was fostered and educated in Connacht with the O’Conors; Donnchadh Cairbrech O’Brien, so called, because he had been fostered with the MacCarthy of Carbery in the county of Cork Brian Luighech O’Conor, so called because he had been fostered with (I believe) the O'Haras of Leyncy; Donnchadh Muimhnech, and Donnchadh Cenniselach O'Kelly, of Hy-Mainé, because they were respectively fostered and educated in Munster and in Hy-Kinsella in Leinster; and so with many others.

Military Education in Erin, a system of Fosterage.

XVIII.

Notwithstanding the numerous references in our ancient books to the chivalry and military fame of individual champions, we have no reliable authority for the existence of any central military organization under the monarch of Tara, for the general purposes of the nation and the defence of the country at large, down to the time of Conn "of the Hundred Battles", who reigned as supreme monarch from the year of Our Lord 123, to the year 157, in which he was slain. Still there is good reason to believe that a national military organization did actually exist before Conn's time; since we find it stated in the ancient historical tale, known as the battle of Cimcha, that before Conn had come to the monarchy (after the intervention between his reign and that of his father, the monarch Feidlimidh, of the reign of Cuthaeir Mór, who ruled for three years), he appears to have been the commander of the celebrated national militia, or standing army, popularly known as the Fianna Eireann, of whom Cumhall, the father of the celebrated Finn MacCumhaill, and Finn himself, were afterwards in succession the most distinguished commanders.

Origin of the word
"Fianna".

The name Fianna is explained in an ancient glossary preserved in a volume of Brehon Laws.<sup>(255)</sup>

"Fianna, a Venatione, id est, It was from the Hunting which they practised they were so named. Or, Fianna, that is, fineadh, [families,] because it was in tribes they were formed. Or Fianna, that is, Feinneadh [champions], because they were the Champions of the monarch of Erin."<sup>(256)</sup>

This is a very curious and indeed important explanation, or rather, attempt at the derivation of the name. It presents no doubt or difficulty as to the existence of the force; but the commentator is at a loss only to know which of three causes it was that gave occasion to the name. And the value of this difficulty is, to induce him inadvertently to preserve to us in the smallest possible space, allusions to the clear and distinct idea entertained in his time of the peculiar formation, habits, and use of the Feinnean force.

<sup>(255)</sup> In the library of Trin. Coll. Dublin : MS. classed H. 3. 18.

<sup>(256)</sup> Original:—Fianna, a venatione, .i. o'n creisg so gnuir ar beirt fianna fhuu. no fianna .i. fineadh, ar ir ina fhuil ocu' ina naimib no bitir iat. no fianna .i. feinneadh fuis Eirenn iat.

First, he thinks the name Fianna may have been derived from Fiadach, that is, Venatio, or Hunting; clearly implying that these warriors were habitually addicted to the chase; and that this would be a reasonable derivation will appear as we go on. Secondly, the commentator thinks that the name Fianna might be derived from Fineadhla, that is, Families, or Clanns; because it was of such they were composed,—as for instance, the Clanna Baisné, who were Finn MacCumhaill's own clann, and made up the chief part of the Leinster contingent; the Clanna Morna, who were Goll Mac Morna's clann, and supplied the chief part of the Connacht contingent; the Clanna Deaghaidh and others, under the command of Glas-donn, of Beara (Berhaven), who were the Munster contingent; and so on. Thirdly, the commentator thinks that the name may have been derived from the word Feinnid, a Champion; because they were “the champions of the monarch of Erin”; and this last derivation is indeed the most probable and rational.

The Rev. Dr. Keting, in his well-known abstract of the history of Erin, quotes from some ancient book, (most probably the Leabhar-na-li-Ua Chongbhala, or Book of Navan), a curious tract on the formation, education, discipline, and laws of the Fianna Eireann, of which I have never had the good fortune to meet with another copy; and that it was from the Book of Navan that Keting did take it, is to some extent borne out by the fact of finding the following note, on this very subject, quoted in the Book of Ballymote, from the Book of Navan, in a sketch of the high personal qualities and the magnificence of the monarch Cormac Mac Airt and his reign.

Mention of the Fianna in the “Book of Navan”.

“The monarch of Erin, (i.e. Cormac) appointed an army over the men of Erin; and over it he appointed three times fifty royal Feinian officers, for the purpose of enforcing his laws, and maintaining his sovereign rule, and preserving his game; and he gave the command of the whole, and the High-stewardship of Erin to Finn Ua Baisné, [that is, Finn Mac Cumhaill].”<sup>(257)</sup>

It appears from a poem written by Cinaedh O'Hartagan (who died 975) on the glories and magnificence of Tara in Cormac Mac Airt's time, that there existed at Tara at this time a spacious barracks in which were lodged no less than seven thousand five hundred men.<sup>(258)</sup> The following are the stanzas of this most curious poem, which refer to the great barrack at Tara. •

Great Barrack of Tara described by Cinaedh O'Hartagan.

<sup>(257)</sup> original:—Ro oíocht óin, nís éirenn (i. Cormac), a amraic for fearaib éirenn; no oíocht tui caecait nís feinnib, formarrae fú comur a éana, ocu a fmaeata, ocu a fiadaib; no pat a cennact uile, ocu aomacraoete éirenn o'fno na baircne.—[B. of Ballymote, fol. 145, a.]

<sup>(258)</sup> This poem is published in Dr. Petrie's Antiquities of Tara, page 164, and printed in the eighteenth volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy.

XVIII.

- " Its great house of thousands of soldiers,—
 To generations it was not obscure;
 A beautiful, brilliant fortress of brave men;—
 Seven hundred feet was its length.
 " It was not filled with the foolish and ignorant,
 Nor over-crowded with the wisely and arrogant;
 It was no small thing to be cut up:
 Six times five cubits was its height.
 " The king had his place there, the king of Erin,
 Around whom the fairest wine was distributed:
 It was a fortress, a castle, a wonder;—
 There were three times fifty compartments in it.
 " Three times fifty Champions with swords,
 (No silly defence for a fortress.)
 That was the number, among the wonders,
 Which occupied each compartment".<sup>(259)</sup>

This poem, it is to be remembered, was written by the great bardic historian Cinaedh O'Hartagan (who died in 975), while the remains of Tara were still distinct and intact, and whilst the written history of that famous hill was still clear and abundant, and its traditions vividly cherished.

Mentioned
 also in Cuan O'Lothchain's
 poem on
 Tara

In Cuan O'Lothchain's poem, written also on the wonders and remains of ancient Tara, we find the following stanza relating to this great barrack or army house:

- " I speak farther of the fortress of the champions;
 (Which was also called the fortress of foolish women);
 The House of the Champions was not a weak one,
 With its fourteen opening doors".<sup>(260)</sup>

Cuan O'Lothchain, the author of this poem, and of whom mention has been often made in the course of these Lectures, died in the year 1024.<sup>(261)</sup>

<sup>(259)</sup> orig. :—A tech moí milibh amurr,— con noimib, nír bo volurr;
 catair glán gleirub glainpep;—
 tpi cet [reét cet] tpaigeo
 a tomur.
 nír tairmchell bairi burbae,
 nacunga gairri garsai;
 nír bo beg tpi chepda:
 fe coic cubac a hapdae.

Aoba púg, ní uar rinní, fopir noailte fin do rinní:
 ba rinn, ba uinn, ba oingna:—
 tpi caecao imdae inne.
 bí caeca laet co laimrib,
 nír bo bpoc baet ap
 bhuigín,
 ba né luét, limb oingna
 cecla ninnraig ví ruirib.

<sup>(260)</sup> orig. :—Impraoim fóp long na laech;
 fupir anabair bapc ban mbaet; co ceitpe voirrib oég.

The whole of this poem also is published in Dr. Petrie's Antiquities of Tara, page 121.

<sup>(261)</sup> See ante, Lecture V., p. 105.

The Rev. Dr. Keting, after a glance at various exaggerated tales and fables concerning Finn Mac Cumhaill and the Fianna, which were in popular favour in his own time, goes on to speak on the subject, as follows

XVIII.

Dr. Keting's
account of the Fianna Éireann.

"Notwithstanding these fables, it is certain that truthful, reliable histories have been written of them; and it is certain that they were not taller or larger in their persons than the men in general who lived in their time; and that they were nothing more than the Buanadhs, or permanent soldiers of the kings of Erin, to defend and preserve the country for them, in the same way that all kings at this day have officers and soldiers to defend their own countries.—

"The way in which the Fianna were disposed was this.—

"They were freely quartered on the men of Erin, from November to May; and they were employed in enforcing right and preventing wrong, under the kings and lords of Erin; and further to guard and defend the harbours of the country against the oppressive intrusion of foreigners.—

"From May to November they employed themselves in fowling and hunting, and in discharging such duties as the monarch of Erin assigned them; such as to check thieves, to enforce the payment of taxes, to check outlaws, and all other evils which may affect the country. For all this they had a fixed stipend, such as all the kings of Europe at the present give to those who are captains and officers under them.—

"The Fianna, however, were obliged to subsist from May to November on the fruits of the chase, both in regard to their food and their pay, in accordance with the rule of the monarchs of Erin, who assigned them the flesh of the animals for their food, and their skins for their pay.—

"They were accustomed to make but one meal in the day and night, and this at evening time; and this was their custom. The chase which they ran down in the morning they sent by their attendants at midday to an appointed hill, contiguous to a wood and moorland: there they lighted great fires, into which they put a great quantity of sandstones. They next dug two trenches in the yellow clay of the moor; and, having set part of the venison upon spits to be roasted before the fire, they bound up the remainder in sugans or sedge-ropes, or bundles of sedge, which they placed to be cooked in the larger of the two trenches previously cut. There they set round them the stones which had been heated in the fire, and kept heaping them on the bundles of meat until they had made them broil freely, and the meat had become thoroughly cooked. And these fires were so great that their black, burned sites remain to be seen in various parts

XVIII.

Dr. Keting's
account of the Fianna
Eireann.

of Erinn to this day; and it is these that are called by farmers Fulachta Fiann, (the cooking-places of the Fianna).—

“Asto the Fianna, when they were assembled at the hill at which was the fire, every man of them stripped himself to the skin, and tied his shirt around his waist; and they then gathered around the second pit which we have mentioned above, bathing their heads and washing their limbs, to remove the sweat from them. They then began to supple their thews and sinews (by gentle exercise), until they had in this manner put off from them their fatigue, after which they ate their meal. That being over, they commenced constructing their Fianbhotha, (i.e. Hunting-tents), and preparing their beds, and putting themselves in order for sleep. Of the following three materials then did each man construct his bed, namely, of the brushwood of the forest, of moss, and of fresh rushes. The brushwood was laid next the ground; over it was laid the moss; and lastly the fresh rushes were spread over all. It is these three materials that are designated in our ancient books as the Tri Cuilceda na Feinne (i.e. the Three Beddings of the Fianna)”.

I may observe here, in corroboration of the learned and trustworthy authority of Keting, that the Fiann-bhotha, or hunting-booths of the Fianna, and even of Finn MacCumhaill himself, are spoken of in Cormac's Glossary, a compilation of the close of the ninth century, as well as in several other ancient books, of equal authenticity.

Keting enters into farther proofs of the authenticity of the rational history of the Fianna Eireann, or Militia of Erinn, and defends them and their celebrated commander from the fabulous account published of them by the Scottish historian Hector Boetius.

“It is improperly”, says Keting, “that Hector Boetius, in his History of Scotland, calls Finn MacCumhaill a ‘Giant’; and he speaks falsely when he says that he was fifteen cubits in height; because it is quite manifest from our ancient historical books, that he was not larger than the men in general of his time; and it is also manifest that there were several men of the Fiann yet taller, stouter, and stronger than he was. The reason that he was made chief of the Champions of Erinn was, because his father and grandfather had been such before him, and also because he excelled in knowledge, learning, wisdom, acuteness, and valour, all the warriors of his time; and it was on this account that he was appointed Royal Commander of the Fianna, and not from the size and stature of his person above other men.—

“The ordinary strength of the force which Finn commanded, and which was generally quartered freely throughout the country, was Three Caths or Battalions, each consisting of three thousand men. This was when peace reigned between all the men of Erin and the Ard-Righ or monarch. But when dissensions arose between any large section of the men of Erin and the monarch, or when it was necessary to send an army into Scotland to sustain the Dalriadan colony of the Gaedhil against foreign foes, then Finn commanded Seven Caths or Battalions; so that he had troops sufficient to relieve the Dalriads in Scotland, and to protect Erin from foreign tyranny, at the same time.—

XVIII.
Dr. Keting's
account of the Fianna
Eireann.

"Many were the chief captains or leaders that were in command under Finn, such as a Cath-Mhiledh, over a Cath or Battalion, the same as the colonel of a regiment now; a Ceann-feadhua-Ceud, the same as a Captain of an hundred now; a Taoiseach-Caoguid, or Leader of Fifty, the same as a lieutenant now; and a Taoiseach-Tri-nonbair, or Leader of Twenty-seven, the same as a corporal now; and a Taoiseach Nonbair, or leader of nine, the same as the Decurion with the Romans. For, when an hundred men were thrown into ten platoons or ranks, there was an officer to each rank of them; and it was he that was called the Leader of Nine.—

"There were four conditions which every man who was received into the Fianns was obliged to fulfil—

"The first condition was, that he should not accept any fortune with a wife, but to select her for her moral conduct and her accomplishments.—

"The second was, that he should not insult any woman.—

"The third was, that he should not refuse any person for trinkets or food.—

"The fourth was, that he should not turn his back on (that is, fly from) nine champions".

Here follow the additional conditions which Finn Mac Cumhaill attached to the military degrees, and which every man was obliged to accept before he was received into the Fianna.

"The first condition was, that no person was admitted into them at the great meetings of Uisneach, nor at the fair of Tailltin, or at the feast of Tara, until his father and his mother, his tribe and his relatives, gave security that they would never avenge his death on another person; in order that he should not expect any one to avenge him but himself; and no matter what evils he might commit, that his friends were not to be sued for them.—

"The second condition was, that no man should be taken into the Fianna, until he was an accomplished poet, and had read the Twelve Books of Poetry.<sup>(302)</sup>—

(302) [Fileadeacht,—Philosophy.

XVIII.

Dr. Keting's
account of the Fianna
Eireann.

"The third condition was, that no man was received into the Fianna, until a wide pit had been dug for him, in which he was to stand up to his knees, with his shield in one hand, and a hazel stake the length of a champion's arm, in the other; nine warriors armed with nine sleghs (or spears) came to within the distance of nine ridges (of ground) of him; and these used to throw their nine spears all at once at him; and should he be wounded, despite the shield and the hazel staff, he was not received into the order of the Fianna.—

"The fourth condition: No man was received into the Fianna until his hair was first plaited, and till he was then chased through several forests, with the whole of the Feinnian host in pursuit of him, with full intent to wound him, the distance between them being but one tree; and if they came up with him they wounded him, [and then he could not be taken into the Fianna].—

"The fifth condition: No man was received into the Fianna if the arms trembled in his hands.—

"The sixth condition: No man was received into the Fianna, if a single braid of his hair had been loosened out of its plait by a branch in the wood (as he ran through it).—

"The seventh condition: No man was received into the Fianna whose foot had broken a single withered branch in his course.—

"The eighth condition: No man was received into the Fianna unless he could jump over (the branch of) a tree as high as his forehead, and stoop under one as low as his knee (without delay to his speed), through the great agility of his body.—

"The ninth condition: No man was received into the Fianna unless he could pluck a thorn out of his heel with his hand, without hindrance to his speed.—

"The tenth condition: No man was received into the Fianna until he had first sworn fidelity and obedience to the king (or Commander) of the Fianna" —

So far Dr. Keting on the organization and use of this celebrated ancient militia, in the time of their last and most distinguished leader Finn MacCumhaill. I say last, because Finn having broken his allegiance to the monarch Cairbré Liffeachair, the son and successor of the wise monarch Cormac Mac Airt, his Fianna were annihilated soon after at the battle of Gabhra by Cairbré and his forces.

Although, as I have already stated, I have not been able to meet with any copy of the tract which Keting quotes, older than his own version of it, I have met with several ancient authorities on the actual existence of the Feinnian Militia under Finn Mac Cumhaill and his predecessors. One of these authorities is, a curious list of the names, and sometimes the pedigree and entry of the native district, of one hundred and fifty of the subordinate officers or Captains of Nine men, who held command under Finn himself. This list is preserved in the ancient manuscript known as the "Yellow Book of Lecan," in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, (class II. 2, 16), a manuscript which was compiled in the year 1391, from more ancient records, by Gilla Isa Mór Mac Fírbis, of Lecan Mac Fírbisigh, (in the county of Sligo). The original compiler adds that it was Finn Mac Cumhaill and his Fianna that gained the following battles: the battle, of Cuil Cuilleann, (the situation of which I am not acquainted with); the battle of Cliach, (on the border of Tipperary and Limerick); the battle of Cumar-Tri-Nuisci, (near Waterford); the battle of Magh Mis, (in Kerry); the battle of Sliabh Mis, (in the same county); the battle of Sídh Femen, now Sliabh-na-m-ban, (in Tipperary); the battle of Féaa, (in the county of Wexford, I believe); and the battle of Inis-Derglocha, (the situation of which I do not know).

XVIII.

List of names of Fennian officers in the "Yellow Book of Lecan".

Battles won by the Fianna of Finn Mac Cumhaill.

It is not stated, however, for whom or in what cause these battles were fought, nor is there mention of any of them in the Annals of the Four Masters; but these annals are very meagre about the occurrences of this period. But although these annals are silent on any of the achievements of the Fianna, (except in the one instance of the battle of Gabhra, near Tara, fought A.D. 284, but of which I shall speak bye and bye), still there is a remarkable and doubtless true account of another battle in which Finn Mac Cumhaill and his warriors took a decided part, but one most unfortunate for the stability of his forces.

The first place in which I find Finn and his men engaged was at the battle of Cnamhros, fought somewhere in the present Queen's County, I think towards its south end, and on the brink of the river Bearbha [Barrow]. This battle of Cnamhros arose out of the fatal imposition of the tax called the Boromean Tribute, of the origin of which I detailed to you the history on a former occasion.<sup>(263)</sup> This tribute continued to be paid with reluctance, and often levied by force of arms, from the time of king Tuathal, who reigned from A.D. 76 to 106, down to that of Cairbré Liffeachair, who was monarch from A.D. 268 to 284.

Battle of Cnamhros fought by Finn Mac Cumhaill and his Fianna.

When Cairbre assumed the reins of government, he immediately, according to ancient custom, demanded the Boromean Tribute from Breasal Belach, the king of Leinster; but Breasal refused to pay it without a battle. Cairbré, accordingly, pro-

(263) See Lectures on the MS. Materials, etc., p. 230, etc.

XVIII.

Battle of Cnamhros
fought by Finn Mac
Cumhaill
and his Fianna.

ceeded to muster the men of the northern half of Erin, (that part known as Leath Chuinn, or Conn's Half); and at their head he marched into Leinster, penetrating as far as the Cnamhros above mentioned, on the bank of the Bearbha.

The king of Leinster, who knew that he was to expect nothing less than such an invasion, was not idle in the meantime. He held at once a meeting of the chiefs of the province, to deliberate on the best course to be pursued in case of the advance of an army so much superior to his own as that of the monarch of all Erin, to make an attack on him at his own door. The determination at which they arrived was, to invite Finn Mac Cumhaill and his Fianna to abandon the cause of the monarch to whose service he was bound, and to join his forces to those of his immediate countrymen, (Finn being himself a Leinsterman), against the alleged unjust demands of the chief king. Breasal accordingly set out immediately to wait upon Finn, whom he found at his residence, at a place called Rinn Dubhain, on the east side of the river Bearbha, some distance below Teach Moling, (now Saint Mullin's, in the county of Carlow). There he received a hearty welcome, and at once proceeded to communicate to Finn his distress and the object of his visit, telling him that no person was more imperatively called on to endeavour to cast off the hated impost than Finn himself; and he then addressed him in the following verses:

"O Find! wilt thou come in friendship?

Wilt thou and the Leinstermen be of one accord?

If thou wilt come, arise! give battle

To the powerful hosts of Tara.

"Hast thou heard of the oppressive tribute

Which is carried from us to Conn's Half?

Thirty cows and nine thousand,—

Of beautiful Cows of one age.

"Hast thou heard how the men of Leinster

In crowds have fallen on the battle-plain?

Or hast thou heard that twenty kings

Have fallen for the first evil deed?<sup>(264)</sup>

"Oh! my inmost heart will burst

If I do not avenge my father;

If I retort not his lofty pride

Upon the fierce, haughty Cairbré Liffeachair.

"Woe is he who attempts the sea without a ship!

Woe is he who descends from a high to a low position!

Woe the house that is divided in two parts!

Woe that a noble race should be contemned!

<sup>(264)</sup> The first battle of Rath Inil.

"O son of Cumhall of renowned deeds!

Array thyself, and let us begone;

Grasp ye your arms with pleasure;

And arise, ye Fianna of Find!—O Find!"<sup>(265)</sup>

Finn arose at once after this address, the eloquence of which seems to have been irresistible, and accompanied by such of his Fianna as happened to be then about him, he marched northwards, keeping the river Bearbha on his left hand, until they reached Ros Broc, (the ancient name of the place now called Saint Mullin's, in Carlow). Here resided three fellow pupils of Finn, the three sons of Conga, whose names were Molling the Swift, Ceallach, and Braen; and from them he received a hearty welcome. Having explained to those friends the cause of his march, and his intention to join the king of Leinster against the monarch, he was pressed by Molling the Swift, the eldest of the three brothers, not to hazard an attempt with his then small party to face the monarch with the muster of all the northern half of Erin at his back. Now the number that Finn had with him at this time was fifteen hundred men, with an officer to every thirty of them. Therefore, when Molling the Swift saw that Finn's high spirit had got the better of his judgment, he begged of him to remain where he was at least until he had summoned the remaining part of his Fianna to his presence, who were dispersed over their native districts through the island,—apparently in a way not unlike that in which a modern militia, disbanded during the pleasant times of peace, are scattered amongst the population of the country until the time comes for being called out again on the approach of war. Molling at the same time addressed Finn in a very curious poem (of thirty-one stanzas), offering the hospitalities of his house until his troops had gathered around him from their different localities. And this account is particularly interesting, because in the

XVIII.

Battle of Chamhros
fought by Finn Mac
Cumhall
and his
Fianna.

(265) orig. :—A finno in nérsgí ní báig?
in bia ocúr laigín doenláim?
ma tíci, eirig! fep chath,
ra pprim tuatáib Tempad.
in cualaoair in cain tuim
beapn uain illeth Cuimo?
cipcha bó noe míle,
so buaib caema comóine.
in cualaoairín lagin
so tuicim in oen magin?
n'ón cualaoair fichit níg
so tuicim tuipín mignim?
Or memair mo éiríe cain
ácc maní vīgloirra m'atair;

maní nimpriu a uabap arto ar Coirpne lipheáir langais.
maing tuallair cen luig
oar lepi!
maing tuallair a haro in irel!
maing bale bir ar oa paimo!
maing oo beip rár ar
raepclaino!
Amic Cumail a robe glono!
geib immotir imchgeom;
geib bap na rma co gnuo;
ocur eirigto a fian finno.
A finno.

XVIII.

Battle of Cnamhros
fought by Finn Mac
Cumhaill
and his
Fianna.

poem the writer names many of these localities, as well as of the chiefs and captains of the troops dispersed among them,—such as Agruan of Magh Ené, (in the west of Donegal); Dícholl of Druim-da-Chonor; Donn Mac Doghar of Magh Adhair, in the present county of Clare); Caeman at Sliabh Crot, (on the borders of Limerick and Cork); Aedh, from the banks of the Boyne; Duban from Druim Daoilé; Lugard and Geiné, (chiefs who are not named in connection with any particular place); Idland, from Leith (in Kerry); Garad, from Askeaton, in the county of Limerick; Breasal, the grandson of Baisné, Finn's own brother, from Leinster; Crimhthann and Dithrabhuich, from the same country; Maelerund, from Creamhchaill; Maelugra; Flaithchins the Valiant; and Cuan the Victorious, from other places, etc. And so Molling goes on to name the various Feinian chiefs.

Finn followed the advice of Molling, and delayed at the residence of his friend, until all the captains whom he had summoned came up to him with their troops. As soon as all were assembled, he reviewed his little army, and then set forward to the place where he had heard the monarch was encamped; and this was at Rath Inil, which was also called the Garbhthamnach, that is, the “Cruel Grave” of the two daughters of the monarch Tuathal, who were here buried, at their death, two hundred years before, but whose bodies (we are told) were soon afterwards exhumed by their valiant father and interred by him at Finncharn, or the “White Heap”, (among the Pagan sepulchral mounds in the vicinity of New Grange on the left bank of the river Boyne). Finn and his troops rested for the night at the Garbhthamnach; and early on the following morning they marched to the encampment of the king of Leinster, which was in the immediate neighbourhood. Both leaders then went forward at the head of their respective forces to Cnamhros, where those of the monarch Cairbré Liffeachair were drawn up in order of battle.

A hard and equally-well-contested battle was fought then between both parties. The monarch's forces, however, found themselves unable to withstand the vehement valour of the Leinstermen and their allies, and they were forced to give way and retreat in all directions, leaving, it is said, nine thousand men dead on the field of battle, as well as the monarch's three sons themselves, namely, Eochaidh, and Eochaidh Domlen, and Fiacha Sraibtiné.

The time of this battle of Cnamhros is not given by the Analists, and we have little to say farther of Finn Mac Cumhaill and his warriors till the battle of Gabhra, which was fought in the year 284.

After this revolt of Finn Mac Cumhaill against the monarch Cairbré Liffeachair, he lost all trust for ever in the fidelity and loyalty of the Fianna, and his confidence was transferred to Aedh Caemh, (Hugh "the beautiful"), of the Clanna Morna, captain of the Connacht Fianna, a brave hero, to whom the monarch then gave the chief command, not only of his own contingent, but also of such new levies or recruits as he might deem proper to add to their ranks.

It is recorded in the Annals of the Four Masters, at the year 283, that Finn MacCumhaill was killed by Aichleach, son of Duibhdreann, at Ath Brea, on the Boyne.

There was at this time a violent feud existing between the Monarch Cairbré and Mogh Corb, son of Cormac Cas, king of Munster (the ancestor of the Dalcassians of Thomond). This Cormac Cas had been married to Samair, the daughter of Finn Mac Cumhaill, by whom he had three sons, namely, Finné, Connla, and Mogh Corb; and when the estrangement took place between the monarch and Finn, and after the death of the latter, this Mogh Corb took his uncle Oisín the poet, who succeeded his father as commander of the Fianna, into his confidence and pay, together with his men. The Clanna Morna, who were now the monarch's favourite standing army, had long been jealous of the important hold which the Clanna Baoiscné, that is Finn Mac Cumhaill's clann, had so long held in the country, and being now in the monarch's favour, they induced him to improve his enmity against Mogh Corb into a war on him and his province of Munster. The Munster king, however, was beforehand with Cairbré; for, collecting rapidly all the forces he could muster, and uniting them with the battalion of the Fianna under the command of his uncle Oisín, he marched straight towards the seat of monarchy itself, and threatening the very household of the chief king, he encamped at Gabhra Ailé (now the hill of Skreen, near Tara.) To this place the monarch came out against them, and a fierce battle ensued, in which the Munstermen, inferior in number, suffered sorely.

Destruction
of the Fianna at the Battle of
Gabhra.

Among the slain in this battle was Oscar, the famous son of Oisín, who was killed by the cast of a spear (cast from on horseback, it is curious to observe), by the monarch Cairbré. Cairbré himself at the same time received a wound from Oscar; and he was soon after slain on the field of battle by Simeon the son of Cerb, a warrior of the people of Forth in Leinster. Of the brave band of the veteran Fianna, who so often fought and won under the command of Finn Mac Cumhaill, and his father and grandfather, scarcely one survived the fatal battle of Gabhra.<sup>(366)</sup>

(366) Some of the incidents of this battle are related in an ancient poem as-

XVIII.

It does not appear, as far as I can discover, that the Fianna Eireann, or Irish Militia, were ever afterwards embodied or maintained under the same conditions as formerly, after the death of Finn and Oscar and the fatal issue of the battle of Gabhra.

It would serve the purpose of these lectures but little to enter into any minute accounts or enumeration of all the other references to the existence of a permanent central military force in Erin, supported under the direct control of the monarch, and for national purposes. Many such allusions are to be found; and all bear upon the existence of a regular military system, the nature of which can best be realized in the example already given of the institution in its best time, that of the Fianna of Finn and of Mac Morna. Nor was this system confined to the support of a central army or national militia; for there are abundant references to be found to the existence of a similar organization under the provincial and even minor kings, for the defence of each province and smaller division of the country.

Instances of a regular army in Ireland after the battle of
Gabhra:

A few instances of the employment of a regular army by the kings of Erin, an army commanded by professional officers, and organized in a permanent manner, may here however be given, in proof that the institution by no means disappeared after the disaffection and destruction of the Fianna.

Battle of Caenraíghé;

We have it on record in the Book of Ballymote, in a very ancient tract, that Niall "of the Nine Hostages", who reigned as monarch of Erin from A.D. 379 to 405, sent an organized army into Munster; that this army fought a battle at Caenraíghé, (now Kenry, in the county of Limerick), where they defeated the Munstermen, and returned with fifty hostages from among the nobles of that province; and that this army was commanded by Fiacha, who was the monarch's own brother, as well as his "Tuairgnidhe Catha", (Leader of his army in battle)—an office, apparently, such as that which we should now call "Commander in Chief", or "Commander of the Forces".

Fianna
under king
Diarmait;

Again we find, in an ancient tract, quoted in a former lecture,<sup>(267)</sup> that the monarch Diarmait, son of Fergus Cerrhbhéil, who died A.D. 558, had sent his stewards and his Fianna or standing army all through the country to collect his tributes, cribed to Oisín, and preserved in the old Book of Leinster which has been lately published, with an English translation, by the "Ossianic Society", together with part only of another poem, much more modern indeed, but still ancient, on the same subject: and I may add that my learned friend the [late] Rev. William Hamilton Drummond, (the librarian of the Royal Irish Academy) has also lately published a spirited but very free translation in verse of the whole poem, in his Ancient Irish Minstrelsy.

(267) See ante, p. 386.

to enforce the laws, and to maintain ancient important social customs; and this, it will be remembered, was the indirect cause that led to the abandonment of Tara as the royal residence of the monarchs of Erin ever since his reign.

And again, from the poem already quoted,<sup>(268)</sup> on the death, in the year 645, of Raghallach, son of Uathach, king of Connacht, we find him marching with the whole concourse of people who attended at the ancient public games and sports of his palace of Cruachan, in pursuit of the Ulstermen who selected that great day to enter his province for the purpose of plunder. And among this great concourse, the king's Royal Guard of a thousand regular soldiers was not the least important body, as may be seen from the following stanza of the poem:

"His royal Mercenaries around Raghallach;
Ten hundred champions with their shields;
The front of battle was theirs to maintain;
Theirs was the first spear in the conflict".<sup>(269)</sup>

One thousand regular professional soldiers, who constantly attended on the king's command, and had their chief residence at his court, formed no trifling force at this remote time.

And lastly, we find in the detailed account of the battle of Almhain, (now the Hill of Allen in the county of Kildare), fought in the year 718, between the monarch Fergal Mac Maoile-duin, and the men of Leinster, that the monarch was killed there, with six thousand<sup>(270)</sup> of his Amhuis or "Mercenaries", and a great number of the northern chiefs and warriors.

This was one of the last great battles which arose out of that long and fatal cause of domestic warfare, the Boromean Tribute. The monarch Fergal, who then resided at the provincial palace of Aileach, (near Derry), spent a long time in collecting a sufficiently strong force with which to march into Leinster to demand the Boromean Tribute, which if not paid him voluntarily, he was determined to raise by force from the king of Leinster, Murchadh, son of Bran Muidé. He set out on his march at length; but having employed bad guides, they led him through the most rough and difficult roads and passes of the country, until after much toil and fatigue they found themselves at last in the neighbourhood of Cluain Dolcain, (now Clondalkin in the county of Dublin), and here they pitched their camp in the immediate vicinity of the church.

<sup>(268)</sup> See ante, p. 343.

<sup>(269)</sup> original: — *Ríg amhuir im Raghallac;
uod céo real cona roctairb;
torat cata cornairb;
ba leó an céo go cluataib.*

<sup>(270)</sup> 160, according to other accounts.

XVIII.

*Almhais, or mercenaries
at the battle of Almhais [Hill of Allen],
A.D. 718;*

The northern soldiers behaved, it appears, with much rudeness towards the church, and particularly to a poor leprous recluse who had a separate hut in its precincts, and to whom the authorities of the church had assigned a milch cow for his special use. This hut the northerns tore down over his head, wounding his person with a spear; and they killed his only cow. Such sacrilegious conduct on the part of his countrymen, so annoyed the pious feelings of Cubretan, son of Aengus, king of the men of Ross (the district around Carrickmacross, in the present county of Monaghan), that he wrote the following three stanzas on the spot, deprecating the impious act, and anticipating its disastrous consequences:—

- “Our men are already red with gore,
O valiant Fergal, it is true!
Sorrowful are the People of Mary's Son,
For having torn down his house over the leper's head.
“The leper's cow, the leper's cow,
Was killed after all the oxen:
Woe to the hand that pierced his cloak,
At going into battle against the son of Bran.
“Should it be that we give battle,
Though brave our opponent, the son of Bran,
Much more do we dread than the battle-field,
The loud lamentation which the leper sends forth.” (270)

The monarch Fergal then led his men, who are said to have numbered twenty-one thousand, to the hill of Almhain (in the county of Kildare), where they were met by Murchadh, son of Bran, with a force of only nine thousand, raised hurriedly, and marched precipitately. A battle immediately ensued,—the fiercest, says the historian, that was ever fought in Erin—in which the northerns were defeated, not by mere human strength, the historian says, but by the powerful aid of Saint Brigid of Kildare, who was actually seen hovering over the ranks of the Leinstermen.

Fergal, son of Maelduin, himself fell in this battle by the hand

(271) original :—at ar cat roipens flano,

*a fíng fheagaile aogluino!
aobronaig muintir mic muirne,
ar mbneith a taigi oia chuno.
Do in élaith, do in élaith,
do gao anvegaro in daim.
maing láim len tollao a brat,
ina teet i cat co mac mbrian.
Da mbneith neach od beirao cat,
ma tén opeman nua, mac mbrian,
anora leam oloar moirae,
in cae po éanao in élaith.*

of Adla, son of Bran, king of South Leinster, and brother to the chief king of Leinster. With him fell twenty of the chiefs and petty kings in attendance on him, besides seven thousand of their men. This account states, that among these seven thousand, were only one hundred and sixty-three of his Amhuis or Body Guard; but that this number bore no proportion to the entire number of his Royal Guard, or permanent army, we have clear evidence in the following three stanzas, written on this disastrous battle, at the the time, by the poet, Nuadha O'Lom-thuilé, who says:

XVIII.
Amhuis, or mercenaries
at the battle of Almhain (Hill of Allen), A.D.
716;

- "At mid-day, at Almhain,
In defence of the cows of Breaghmhainé,
A red-mouthed beaked vulture raised
A shout of exultation over the head of Fergal.
"Murchadh put off his former debility,
Many a brave man did he cut to the ground;
He turned his arms against Fergal,
With his immense body of Fianna at Almhain.
"There fell there one hundred brave, gifted chiefs,
With one hundred valiant officers;
Besides nine who ran to madness;
And seven thousand armed men".

In a fine old detailed account of this famous battle, in my possession, the number of the monarch's Amhuis, or Guard of Fianna, killed there is set down as sesca ced, which I would certainly read as sixty hundred, or six thousand. The Four Masters, however, and the compiler of the Chronicon Scotorum, make it but a hundred and sixty; and to their reading of these words I bow.

From these and many other similar instances, some relating to the forces of the chief king, some to those of the provincial kings, we may form a clear opinion that the monarch of Erin, as well as the provincial and smaller kings, had always a regular standing army, of numbers more or less, whether under the name of Fianna or of Amhuis, on whom he could call on all sudden emergencies, either to enforce his laws, or to repel his domestic or foreign foes.

The Danish wars having set in soon after the battle of Almhain, there was after this period, indeed, little time given to the monarch or to the minor kings to organize and maintain special bodies of regular troops, because, in fact, the whole country had to take up arms; and the men of every province and chieftaincy were liable to be called out at a moment's notice to oppose the ever active and cruel foreigner. There are, however, in our old writings, references to bodies of men who are

XVIII.

Lucht Tighé, or household
troops

called the "Lucht Tighé", or Household Troops, of kings and chiefs; and particularly in the account of the battle of Clontarf, (fought in the year 1014), where the Lucht Tighé of Tadhg O'Kelly, king of Ui Mainé in Connacht, and of Ferghal O'Ruairc, king of Breejney, did great execution on the foreigners, independently of the general Connacht contingent. And even so late as the year 1593, we find Hugh McGuire, Lord of Feranagh, marching to battle with the people of his own territory and a body of Amhuis, or Mercenary Household Troops drawn from other territories or countries.

The regular organization of these household troops or body guards of the chieftain is instanced besides in the names of certain places, as, for example, we know that there was anciently a district in Monaghan, which was called Lucht Tighé mhic Muthgamhna, that is Mac Mahon's Household, because it was exclusively devoted to the maintenance of that chief's household troops or standing army.

And in the Brehon Laws this institution is made the subject of positive rule; for, it is stated there that every king of a Tricha Céd, or Thirty Hundreds of Land, should support seven hundred warriors: a law, the necessity of which is intelligible enough, when we remember that the duty of these regular forces included all those which are in modern times performed by the police as well as by the military authorities of a civilized nation.

